" The corporations of every city were oblig'd to provide a houſe for their new-" married citizens, and the neareſt relations to furniſh them with moveables. They " did not allow the inhabitants of one province or city to marry with thoſe of another,
" but were all oblig'd to marry among themſelves, and with their own relations, like
" the antient tribes of Iſrael; which was done to prevent their nations and families " from being blended and confounded with one another. They nevertheleſs excepted
" ſiſters. All the inhabitants of the ſame city, or of the ſame province, call'd themſelves " relations, in caſe they were of the ſame nation, and ſpoke the ſame language. To " which let us add, that they were forbid to quit their province or city, or to go " from one diſtrict to another, becauſe they could not confound the Decuriæ which " had been eſtabliſh'd by the citizens; beſides their corporations regulated the houſes,
" which they were not permitted to do more than once, and that only in their own
" diſtrict, and with the conſent of their relations.

" The heir to the crown uſed to marry his own ſiſter, in imitation of the ſun and the " firſt Incas. For, ſaid they, ſince the ſun took the moon his ſiſter to wife, and had mar" ried their two firſt children together, 'twas but reaſonable the ſame order ſhould be " obſerv'd with regard to the king's eldeſt children. They alſo added, that the blood " of the ſun muſt not be mix'd with that of men; that the ſucceſſion ought to devolve " on the heir both of the father and mother's ſide, and that otherwiſe he loſt his right;
" for they were very exact with regard to the ſucceſſion to the crown.

" The elder brother was lawful heir to the crown, and married his own ſiſter; but " in default of an own ſiſter, he married that woman of the blood-royal, who was " neareſt related to him, whether ſhe were his half-ſiſter, his couſin, his neice, or his " aunt; and this ſhe-relation might inherit the crown in default of male-iſſue, as in " Spain. In caſe the king's eldeſt ſiſter brought him no children, he married her ſe-
" cond or third ſiſter, till ſuch time as ſome were born to him.

" This wife was call'd Coya, i. e. queen or empreſs: theſe kings, beſides their law" ful wife, uſually kept ſeveral miſtreſſes, ſome of whom were aliens, and others re" lated in the fourth degree of conſanguinity, and even beyond. They look'd upon
" thoſe

" thoſe children which they had by their relations as legitimate, becauſe they were of " their own blood; but thoſe which the Incas's had by aliens, were conſider'd as " baſtards: for notwithſtanding the reſpect that was ſhewn them becauſe of their royal " extraction, they yet did not revere them as much as thoſe of the royal-blood: theſe " they worſhipp'd as gods, but honour'd the others as men." The firſt compartment of the plate repreſents a marriage ſolemniz'd by the Incas's.

Purchas relates, on the teſtimony of the Spaniſh writers, that the bridegroom us'd to go to the houſe of his bride, and put her on the Otoia, a kind of ſhoe. If the bride were a virgin, the ſhoe was made of wool; but if a widow, 'twas made of a kind of reed. The royal habit of the Incas requires a particular explication; for which purpoſe we ſhall borrow the deſcription of it from the author of the hiſtory of the Incas's. " The Incas generally wore a kind of twiſt about his head, call'd Lauta, of about an " inch wide, and made almoſt in a ſquare form, which went five or ſix times round " his head, with a colour'd border that reach'd from one temple to the other.

" His habit was, a waiſt-coat that reach'd down to the knee, call'd by the natives " Uncu, and by the Spaniards, Cuſma; which is not a word of the general language, " but rather of ſome particular province. Inſtead of a cloak they wore a kind of Sur- " tout call'd Yacola. The nuns alſo made a kind of ſquare purſe for the Incas's, " which they wore as it were in a ſling, tyed to a twiſt very neatly wrought, and " about the breadth of two fingers. Theſe purſes, call'd Chuſpa, were us'd only " to hold the herb Cuca or Cocoa, which the Indians generally chew. This Cuca " was not then ſo common as in our days; for none but the Incas was allow'd to eat of " it, his relations and certain Curacas excepted, to whom the king us'd to ſend yearly " ſeveral baskets full, by way of preſent, which was look'd upon as a very great " favour."

From their marriages we paſs on to thoſe cuſtoms which relate to their children and the education they gave 'em. " [a] The Incas's always made great feaſts, and extraor- " dinary rejoicings at the weaning of their eldeſt children; becauſe the right of ſenio- " rity, particularly of males, was had in great eſteem by the Incas's, and, after their " example, by all their ſubjects; but few rejoicings were made at the birth of their " daughters or younger children.

" They wean'd their children at two years old, and cut off the hair which they had " brought with them into the world; never touching them till that time, nor did they " give them the name by which they were to be call'd. When this ceremony was " to be perform'd, all the relations met together, and he who was choſen godfather " firſt cut the child's hair with his ſciſſors, if we may give that name to certain razors " made of flint-ſtone, which they employ'd for that purpoſe; the Indians being " unacquainted with thoſe ſciſſors us'd among us. After the godfather, the reſt " cut off ſome of the child's hair in their turn, according to their age and quality, " which done, they all agreed upon giving it a name, and then offer'd it their ſeveral " gifts; ſome giving clothes, others cattle, others weapons of ſeveral kinds, and others " gold and ſilver drinking-veſſels; which however were preſented to none but thoſe " of the royal extraction, for the common ſort of people were not allow'd to uſe 'em, " unleſs by a ſpecial grant.

" The preſents being made, they all drank copiouſly, otherwiſe the feſtival wou'd " have been good for nought, and danc'd and ſung till night. This laſted for three " or four days, according to the quality of the child's relations. They obſerv'd al- " moſt the ſame ceremony at the weaning of the heir to the crown, and alſo cut off " his hair; if we except that this was a royal ſolemnity, and that the high-prieſt of the " ſun was always choſen for his godfather. On this occaſion all the Curacas of the " king-

[a] Hiſtory of the Incas's of Peru, Book IV. Chap. 11. The figure under the marriage of the Incas's repreſents that ceremony.

" kingdom aſſiſted perſonally, or by their ambaſſadors, at this ſolemnity, which held " for twenty days together; and made rich preſents to the prince, ſuch as gold, ſilver, " precious-ſtones, and the moſt valuable things of their reſpective provinces.

" As ſubjects love to imitate their princes, the Curacas, and in general all thoſe of Peru, " made likewiſe great rejoicings on theſe occaſions, according to their rank and quality; " and this was one of their moſt ſolemn feſtivals.

" They were extremely careful not to bring up their children too tenderly, and this " was generally obſerv'd from the king to the beggar. The moment the child was " born, it was waſh'd with cold water, and then wrapp'd up in ſwadling-clothes, which " they repeated every morning, after having left that water in the dew the greateſt " part of the time. Moreover, when the mother was for fondling her child in an extra- " ordinary manner, ſhe took water in her mouth, and ſpurted it over all his body, the " crown of the head excepted, which ſhe never touch'd. When thoſe people were " ask'd why they did this, they anſwer'd, that they did it to inure their children to " cold and toil, and ſtrengthen their limbs. They never ſwath'd their arms till they " were upwards of three months old, ſaying, that it wou'd only weaken 'em: more- " over, they generally kept 'em in a cradle, which was a kind of bench four foot " long, as we ſee it repreſented in the figure, one of which was made ſhorter than the " reſt, purpoſely that they might be rock'd with greater eaſe. The bed in which the " child lay, was a kind of coarſe net, in which the babe was wrapp'd on both ſides " of the cradle, to prevent his falling out.

" Mothers never took their children in their arms, not even when they gave 'em " ſuck; for, ſaid they, they would always be for ſtaying in them, were they to be " us'd to it, and that then 'twou'd be a difficult matter to confine 'em to their cradles. " However, whenever they thought proper to take 'em out of it, they us'd to make a " hole in the ground, and ſet the child upright in it breaſt-high; they then ſwath'd 'em " with old clouts or rags, in order to make them lie the ſofter, and at the ſame time " gave them ſeveral play-things to divert them with, but never once took them in " their arms, tho' they were the children of the greateſt lords in the empire. When " a mother wanted to give her child ſuck, ſhe us'd to lay herſelf down upon it, but " never gave it ſuck above three times a-day, viz. at morning, noon and evening; " nor would ſhe ever give it the breaſt but at thoſe times, and would let it ſquall, ra- " ther than ſuffer it to get a habit of ſucking all-day-long. All the women of that " country did the ſame, and the reaſon they gave for it was, that it made 'em naſty, " and ſubject to vomiting; that they became gluttons when grown up; and that the " beaſts themſelves furniſh'd 'em with an example, who never ſuckled their young but " at certain times of the day, and not all-night-long. The greateſt lady in the empire " brought up her children herſelf, and never gave 'em to another to nurſe, unleſs " forc'd to it by ſome great indiſpoſition; nor had ſhe any commerce with her husband " all the time ſhe ſuckled it, for fear of ſpoiling her milk, which might throw the " child into a conſumption."

As the child grew up, they ſtrengthen'd its body by labour and exerciſe, after which they were put under the direction of the Amautas, who were the Peruvian philoſophers or doctors. Theſe Amautas regulated the manners of their youth; inſtructed 'em in the ceremonies and precepts of religion; in the laws of the empire, and the duty which man owes to his fellow-creatures. The minds of children were cultivated almoſt from their moſt tender infancy; at ſix or ſeven years of age they always had ſome employment aſſign'd them, which was always ſuited to their years. In fine, the care they took to ſhun idleneſs and indolence was ſuch, as might juſtly put nations infinitely more knowing than themſelves, to the bluſh. Nor were they leſs careful of flying from luxury, ſtill more dangerous than idleneſs, whoſe only aim is to flatter the ſenſes and adminiſter fuel to vanity; to awake in us a ſenſe for pleaſures in proportion as it decays in us; and which keeps the ſpirits in a perpetual hurry, even to the laſt gaſp, notwithſtanding its inability to produce the leaſt fruits from all its labours, or even to diſcover one ſingle mark of it.

Their Notions with regard to the Immortality of the Soul, and their Funeral Rites.

THE Amautas made a diſtinction between the body and ſoul of man, aſcribing immortality to the latter, but as for the former they gave it no other name than animated earth. Moreover, "experience, [a] ſays Garcilaſſo, taught 'em, that animals "grow and are indued with ſenſation; they therefore ſuppos'd 'em to be inform'd with "a vegetative and ſenſitive ſoul, but not with a reaſonable one. They were of opi- "nion that there was another life after this, which would be happy for the good, but "unhappy for the wicked, to reward the former and puniſh the latter. Further, they "divided the univerſe into three worlds, to the firſt, which was heaven, they gave the "name of Hanan-Pacha, or the high-world, where the good receive the recompence "of their virtues; the ſecond Hurin-Pacha, or the low-world, becauſe of generation "and corruption; and the third Veu-Pacha, ſignifying the center of the earth, or in- "ferior world, where the wicked were to inhabit. They likewiſe gave the name of "Cupaypa-Huacin to this laſt world, i. e. the devil's-houſe: but they imagin'd that "the life to come was a corporal one, pretty like that we paſs upon earth; and made "the repoſe of the high-world to conſiſt in leading a life of tranquility, free from the "cares and anxieties of this; but then on the other ſide they affirm'd, that the lower- "world which we call hell, was fill'd with all thoſe diſeaſes and evils which afflict "mankind here below, without once enjoying the leaſt interval of repoſe or content- "ment. To this we muſt add, that they did not rank the ſenſual pleaſures, nor the "vices with which the ſoul is ſullied, among the pleaſures of the next life; but that "they made all happineſs to conſiſt in the tranquility of both ſoul and body, which "they placed in a ſtate wholly unruffled with cares or troubles.

"The Incas's alſo believ'd in an univerſal reſurrection, but then their minds did not "ſoar higher than this animal life, for which they ſaid we were to riſe, but without "any expectation of either glory or miſery. They were very careful of the parings "of their nails and the combings of their hair, or that which they cut off; theſe they "laid in the crevices or holes of walls. If any of theſe excreſcencies happen'd at any "time to fall to the ground, and were found by an Indian, he always took 'em up "and laid 'em where they were before. This ſuperſtitious cuſtom often rais'd my cu- "rioſity to enquire into the motives of it, and they all anſwer'd to this purpoſe: Do "you know, ſaid they, that all who are born here below are to live again in this "world, and that the ſouls will come out of their graves with every thing that belong'd "to their bodies? In order therefore that we may not be put to a great deal of trouble "in hunting after our nails and hair, in the prodigious croud and confuſion of that day, "we depoſite them all together in order that we may be able to find them immediately; "nay, we wou'd, if poſſible, always ſpit in the ſame place. Franciſco Lopez de Go- "mara, ſpeaking of the interments of the kings and great lords of Peru, ſays as fol- "lows in the 125th chapter of his work. When the Spaniards open'd thoſe graves, "and ſcatter'd the bones they found in them up and down, the Indians beſought 'em "not to act in that manner, that they might not prevent their finding them at the "day of judgment. Whence 'tis manifeſt that they believ'd in the reſurrection of the "body, and the immortality of the Soul, &c.

HONNEURS FUNÈBRES, rendus aux GRANDS, du Perou apres leur mort.

Maniere D'ENSEVELIR les GRANDS, du Perou.

The Peruvians embalm'd their dead bodies in ſuch a manner, as not only preſerv'd them from rottenneſs and corruption, [a] but alſo made them grow prodigiouſly hard and callous. They us'd to embalm the bodies of their Incas's after this manner: Whenever the Incas's or any great man of the empire happen'd to die, his wives and domeſtics us'd to offer to be put to death, in order to attend upon him in the other world; and there was ſometimes ſuch a croud of them, that they were frequently oblig'd to diſmiſs part of 'em. We may probably ſuppoſe, ſays a [b] traveller, that the prieſts hit upon ſome religious motive to engage them to devote themſelves to death in this manner; otherwiſe, wou'd it be poſſible for us to imagine, that women ſhould be ſo extravagantly fond, as to diſpute who ſhould have the pleaſure of being buried with their husbands? or that their great men could have been able to procure one ſingle domeſtic? They carry'd the body to the place of interment, on a kind of throne, ſupported by a ſort of litter, which was follow'd by the wives and domeſtics of the deceas'd, with proviſions neceſſary for their ſupport in the next life. During the proceſſion, one of the neareſt relations of the deceas'd us'd to ſhoot ſome victuals into his mouth through a tube, like that through which children ſhoot their peas; being perſuaded, that it would be impoſſible for the deceas'd to undergo the fatigues of that journey without ſome ſuch ſuſtenance. A wooden ſtatue repreſenting the deceas'd was plac'd over his grave, when the artificer was there repreſented with his work, and the ſoldier with his arms. The two compartments repreſent the ceremonies here deſcrib'd, and their manner of letting the corps down into the graves.

After they had embalm'd the bodies of the Incas's, they ſet 'em before the figure of the ſun in the temple of Cuſco, and there offer'd ſacrifices to them, as to divine perſons who were the ſun's children. " The firſt month after the king's deceaſe was ſpent in " tears; the citizens wept all-day-long, and gave the higheſt teſtimonies of ſorrow; " the people of the ſeveral diſtricts of Cuſco us'd to aſſemble together, and carry'd the " trophies, the banners, the weapons, the clothes of the Incas, and all things that were " to be buried with him, by way of honouring his obſequies. Their plaints and wail- " ings were intermix'd with a recital of the victories the Incas had gain'd, his remark- " able atchievements, and the grants he had made to thoſe provinces, where ſuch and " ſuch perſons, which they nam'd, were born. The firſt month of mourning being " expir'd, they renew'd it every fortnight, every new-moon, during the firſt year. In " fine, they concluded it with all imaginable ſolemnity and the deepeſt lamentations; " for which purpoſe they had certain hir'd mourners, who us'd to ſing the virtues and " atchievements of the deceas'd in a melancholy tone. In this manner all the inhabi- " tants of Cuſco us'd to mourn. The Incas's of the blood-royal obſerv'd the ſame " cuſtom, excepting that it was perform'd with greater pomp and ſolemnity.

" The ſame cuſtom was obſerv'd in all the other provinces of the empire, every great " man giving the higheſt teſtimonies of his ſorrow for the death of his ſovereign. They " viſited all thoſe places which the king had peculiarly diſtinguiſh'd by his favours or " preſence, and left greater teſtimonies of their affection in them than in other places; " intermixing the recital of favours and grants which they had receiv'd from the de- " ceas'd, with ſobs and lamentations." They celebrated the memory of their Curacas and other great men after the ſame manner.

[a] Hiſtory of the Incas's, Book 5. Chap. 29.
[b] Coreal's Voyages, vol. 2. p. 94.

In what manner they diſtinguiſh'd the Seaſons.

HERE follows the account which [a] Garcilaſſo gives us on this head. "The "common people computed their years by their crops, and all in general by the "ſummer and winter ſolſtices, but in a very particular manner. There were ſixteen "towers at Cuſco, viz. eight to the eaſt, and as many to the weſt, four being built "near one another; the two which ſtood in the middle were not ſo high as the reſt, "and were about three ſtory high or thereabouts; the towers ſtood at eight, ten or "twenty foot diſtance one from the other; and thoſe on the ſides, were much higher "than the watch-towers erected in the ports of Spain, or on the frontiers. They were "even employ'd to that purpoſe, and the ſpace between the little towers thro' which "the ſun paſs'd at his riſing and ſetting, was the point of the ſolſtices.

"The Incas, in order to make this obſervation with greater exactneſs, always plac'd "himſelf in a convenient place, when he obſerv'd attentively whether the ſun roſe and "ſet between the two little towers which ſtood eaſt and weſt. At the ſame time the "moſt skilful Indians uſed alſo to make their obſervations, and in this manner they "fix'd their ſolſtices. This was the only method the Indians had to find out the exact "time of them, and never fix'd them to certain days of the month when they hap-"pen'd; they not computing their months by days, but by moons, as will be ſhewn "in the ſequel. Their year conſiſted of twelve moons, but they had not the art of "adjuſting it with the ſolar year, which was longer by eleven days, ſo that they were "obliged to have recourſe to the ſun's motion, in order to find the true time of the "ſolſtices. 'Twas thus they divided one year from another, and computed from the ſolar "whenever they ſow'd the ground. Some authors have indeed related that they were "able to compute the two years together, but we have reaſon to believe they were "miſtaken, ſince had the Indians underſtood this kind of calculation, they would un-"doubtedly have fix'd the ſolſtices according to the days of the month on which they "happen, and conſequently would not have built towers, or taken ſuch great pains "to look for the riſing and ſetting of the ſun.

"Neither were the equinoxes unknown to them, for they always made great rejoicings "at thoſe ſeaſons. The inhabitants of Cuſco at the vernal equinox us'd to get in their "maiz, and aſſembling together, made great rejoicings, particularly at Collcampara the "garden of the ſun. But they kept one of their four principal feaſts at the brumal "equinox. This people, in order to find out the exact time of the equinox, had rais'd "very rich columns, very finely wrought, in the midſt of thoſe open places which "were before the temple of the ſun. Here their prieſts us'd to aſſemble daily a little "before the equinox, when they took a very exact obſervation of the ſhadow which "thoſe columns projected. The area where they ſtood form'd a circle, from the center "of which they drew a line from eaſt to weſt: repeated experience had taught 'em "the place where they were to look for the point, and they eſtimated by the ſhadow "of the column upon the line, their proximity or diſtance from the equinox. If the "ſhadow went round the pillar from its riſing to its ſetting, and that there was none at "all when it was at the meridian, they took that day for the true equinox; whereupon "they immediately adorn'd theſe columns with flowers and odoriferous herbs, and "afterwards ſtrew'd 'em on the ſun's ſeat or throne, ſaying, that he had that day ſet therein "with all his radiant light, and had ſtopt perpendicularly over their columns. And "indeed they worſhipp'd him that day, with greater demonſtrations of joy and glad-"neſs; and preſented him with magnificent gifts of gold, ſilver, precious ſtones and ſuch

[a] Book 2. chap. 22.

" ſuch like valuable commodities. We may here obſerve, that as the Incas's won
" new provinces, the Amautas, who were their philoſophers, found by new experi" ments, that the nearer they came to the equinoctial line, the leſs ſhadow the pillar " projected when the ſun was at the meridian. For which reaſon thoſe which were in " the city of Quito and about it as far as the ſea-coaſts were moſt eſteem'd; becauſe the
" ſun was perpendicular in thoſe places, and caſt no ſhadow at all when at the meridian.
" Hence they paid a greater reſpect to thoſe columns than to the reſt, and fancied that " the ſun delighted moſt to ſeat himſelf upon them, ſince, ſay they, he takes a plea-
" ſure in ſtanding perpendicularly over them, whereas he never ſtops at the reſt but
" ſide-ways only."

Their Records.

WE ſhall quote Garcilaſſo once more. The relation he has given us appears to be exact; this we probably ſhould have enervated, had we diſguis'd it under new terms; and by putting it into a modern dreſs, we poſſibly might have varied the facts related by him.

" When the Indians were for making their computations, which they expreſs'd by " the word Quipu, ſignifying to tye, or a knot, and is alſo the account itſelf, becauſe
" their knots were made of any kind of thing, they generally uſed thread of various " colours for that purpoſe; for ſome had only one, others two, and others again three,
" and ſo on. Every colour, whether ſingle or mix'd, had a peculiar ſignification. Theſe " ſtrings, which were made of three or four threads twiſted together, about the big-
" neſs of the ſmalleſt twine, and three quarters of an ell long, were threaded in order
" long-wiſe into another ſtring or twiſt, the whole making a kind of fringe. They
" judg'd the import of each piece of thread by its colour, as for inſtance, the yellow
" ſignify'd gold, the white ſilver, and the red the warriors. To denote any particulars " which were not of a remarkable colour, they uſed to ſet 'em according to their re-
" ſpective orders, beginning at the moſt conſiderable, and ſo on to ſuch as were leaſt
" ſo: thus for inſtance, to denote corn or pulſe, the firſt in order wou'd then have " been wheat, next rye, peas, beans, millet, &c. In like manner to denote weapons, " they always plac'd thoſe firſt which they thought the moſt noble: in calculating the " number of their vaſſals, they firſt began by the inhabitants of each city, and then " number'd thoſe of the provinces. The firſt thread was for old men of ſixty or up" wards, the ſecond for thoſe of fifty, the third thoſe of forty, and ſo on in a decimal
" proportion down to the children ſucking at the breaſt: they likewiſe computed the " number of women according to their reſpective ages in the ſame order.

" Some of theſe twiſts or ſtrings had other very thin twiſts in them, all of one colour,
" which ſeem'd to be ſo many exceptions from theſe other general rules; as for inſtance,
" ſuch grandſons as were on the ſtring of the women, or married at ſuch or ſuch an " age, denoted the number of widows and widowers that year: for theſe calculations " were as ſo many annals, and included only the tranſactions during a year.

" They always computed decimally on thoſe ſtrings, viz. by units, tens, hundreds,
" thouſands, tens of thouſands, and ſeldom went further than hundreds of thouſands;
" becauſe as every city, and each capital of a province kept their particular eſtimate,
" the number never went ſo far. Not but if they had been oblig'd to compute by " hundred thouſands, they could have done it, becauſe they can expreſs all arith-
" metical powers in their tongue. Theſe ſeveral numbers which they computed by the " knots of their ſtrings, were ſeparated from one another; and the knots of each number
" was relative to one, like thoſe of a Franciſcan nun; which was done ſo much the " more eaſily, as they never went higher than nine, no more than units, tens, &c.

" The higheſt number, which was tens of thouſands, was at the top of the ſtring;
" next to that thouſands, and ſo on. The knots of each thread and of each number,
" were equal to each other, and diſpos'd as artfully as the moſt skilful arithmetician,
" who is making a long calculation, could have done.

" There were certain perſons among theſe Indians who had theſe Quippu's, or knotted
" ſtrings, under their immediatedirection. They were call'd Quippucamayu's, i. e.
" the perſon who has the care of the accompts, whoſe number was always regulated " in proportion to the inhabitants of the ſeveral cities and provinces: the ſmalleſt city
" was oblig'd to have four at leaſt, and the largeſt had twenty or thirty. They all
" kept the ſame accompt, and were as ſo many checks one to the other, and conſequently
" one accomptant could have tranſacted all the buſineſs; nevertheleſs the Incas would " have ſeveral ſettled in each city, in order to prevent frauds and abuſes; ſaying, that " if there were but a few, they might eaſily combine together and defraud the public,
" which could not be ſo eaſily done, when they were many, and conſequently would " either oblige them all to be juſt and faithful, or ſhare equally in the guilt.

" They computed the ſeveral tributes which the Incas receiv'd every year by knots.
" Here a regiſter of the ſoldiery was kept; of thoſe who had been kill'd in war; of " the births and deaths which happen'd every year, &c. They even computed the " number of battles and skirmiſhes, the ſeveral embaſſies that had been ſent from the " Incas, and the declarations the king had given. But as it was impoſſible to expreſs
" the ſubject and iſſue of the embaſſy, and hiſtorical tranſactions by knots, they
" uſed certain marks to diſtinguiſh the ſeveral memorable actions, the embaſſies,
" and declarations which had been made both in peace and war: the Quippuca-
" mayu's got the ſubſtance of theſe by heart, and taught them the reſt by tradition, " particularly in the cities or provinces where thoſe incidents had happen'd, and
" whoſe inhabitants were more deſirous of tranſmitting them to poſterity, than thoſe
" of any other country. They had alſo another method of recording their moſt me" morable events. The Amautas made them in proſe, and afterwards work'd them " into a kind of ſhort fables, for parents to repeat to their children, and citizens to their " country people; ſo that devolving in this manner from age to age, theſe ſeveral inci" dents might be known to all. They moreover work'd up their hiſtorical relations " in a fabulous and allegorical manner; for which purpoſe their Aravicus's or poets,
" uſed to compoſe ſhort verſes, in which a ſuccinct account of the hiſtory, embaſſy, or
" anſwer made by the king was given; and thus they expreſs'd the ſeveral incidents, " which otherwiſe would have been unintelligible, by knots. They uſually ſung theſe
" verſes in their triumphs, in their moſt ſolemn feaſts, at the coronation of a new Incas,
" and the reſt of their ceremonies."

We ſhall now conclude what we had to obſerve with regard to the religious ceremonies of Peru, and of whatever may be thought relative to them.

EAST-INDIANS,

With thoſe of the JEWS, and other Antient Nations.

I. The general Idea of the following Diſſertation.

IF it be dangerous to write anything concerning foreign countries, becauſe of the prejudice which great numbers of people entertain againſt every thing that comes from far, or appears wonderful; 'tis no leſs ſo for a man to conceal from the world ſuch particulars as he may have ſeen, becauſe ſeveral are of opinion, that a man has no ſooner left his country, but new wonders muſt exhibit themſelves every moment; that all things in foreign nations are ſtrange and ſurprizing, and that every thing which ſtrikes a traveller's eye, muſt neceſſarily afford him inſtruction. So that what reſolution ſoever a traveller may take, he runs the hazard of being cenſur'd either as an inſincere, or an indolent perſon. To pleaſe one part, a man ſhould relate ſuch particulars only as are very trite, and to be daily met with, becauſe the moment any thing extraordinary is related, 'tis immediately look'd upon as fiction; the other are unſatisfy'd, unleſs the writer mentions prodigies in every line; for with theſe, 'tis ſufficient that a piece be written in the common ſtyle of travellers, to make it be rejected with ſcorn, and conſider'd as a trifling performance.

'Tis certain that the following ſheets will not ſuit the taſte of either, ſince as I have liv'd too long in India, not to diſcourſe pertinently on certain matters, which may poſſibly appear ſurprizing to the reader; ſo on the other ſide, I did not reſide long enough there to be able to write confidently on every particular; to flatter myſelf ſo far, as to imagine myſelf thoroughly acquainted with the policy and cuſtoms of the Indians; or that I had acquir'd a knowledge of things in the ſpace of three or four years time, which a man could hardly be maſter of in twenty. But tho' the account I give of the Indies may not pleaſe the readers above-mention'd, it nevertheleſs may not diſpleaſe thoſe who are able to form a juſt idea of things, tho' brought from far, and who judge without prejudice: if theſe ſhould find that I ſometimes miſtake in my parallel between the cuſtoms of the Indians with thoſe of the ancients; I nevertheleſs flatter myſelf, that they will not cenſure the deſire I had of opening to myſelf a path to the knowledge of antiquity, by ſtudying the maxims of thoſe people.

I have wholly deviated from the common road which moſt of our travellers generally ſtrike into: for were a man to write from others, and agree with them in their relations, 'twould be no more than barely tranſcribing 'em, which might eaſily be done without out travelling to countries ſo remote; then again, to vary from them would but heighten the confuſion, which is great enough already among thoſe who have written on that ſubject; nor could a traveller flatter himſelf that his writings would be better receiv'd on that account, or be ſooner believ'd by his readers, who think, as they may ſafely do, that other writers will afterwards ariſe, who will differ from them.

I firſt thought to ſtudy only the religion of the Indians, and was confirm'd in my reſolution by the firſt diſcoveries I had made therein, having obſerv'd a certain order between their principles, and the ſyſtem of their triple divinity, viz. Brama, Witſnou and Devender, as is not found in the multitude of gods ador'd by the Greeks and Romans, and mention'd by Heſiod in his Theogony. But as 'tis the nature of error to be always ſo; that 'tis impoſſible for falſehood to boaſt ſuch a ſeries of proofs and reaſons as illuſtrate each other, but on the contrary, that the whole is a rhapſody of contradiction and obſcurity; when I was for entring into a detail of the different ſects among the Pagans, and for piercing farther into their myſteries, ſo many abſurdities occurr'd, that I thought it would be ridiculous to buſy myſelf any longer in theſe enquiries; eſpecially as the theology of the antient heathens ſcarce agrees with theirs in one ſingle particular. However, I did not form the ſame judgment with regard to their particular cuſtoms, but conſider'd them as ſo many valuable remains of antiquity, which might be of ſervice in illuſtrating ſeveral paſſages in antient Authors, the ſacred writings in particular; this knowledge being abſolutely neceſſary, in order for the giving a natural explanation of certain paſſages which ſome very learned interpreters frequently explain allegorically for want of being acquainted with the cuſtoms of the Eaſterns.

Moreover, we meet with ſeveral paſſages, and even terms in the ſcriptures, which at firſt are ſomething ſhocking; however they ſoon grow familiar to us, after a ſmall acquaintance with the Eaſterns, among whom we ſtill meet with all thoſe characters of antiquity which are found in the bible, and generally in all thoſe books which treat of the Jews and other antient nations.

St. Jerom was very ſenſible of the uſefulneſs of this knowledge. He travell'd over the Eaſt in order to learn the maxims of its inhabitants; and notwithſtanding the reports which were ſpread to the prejudice of his reputation, he nevertheleſs ſtudied under a doctor of the ſchool of Tiberias, who inſtructed him in the antient cuſtoms of the Jews, and aſſiſted him in his tranſlation and commentaries.

My deſign was to have gone over all Aſia, could I have done it with conveniency, and to have made exact obſervations on the moſt minute circumſtances, ſuch as, for inſtance, the antient cuſtoms of the common people, their holidays, proverbs, manner of building, eating, dreſſing, and cultivating the ground; well knowing, that if any footſteps of antiquity are ſtill remaining in the world, we ſhall certainly find them among ſuch people as live in a ſtate of ſimplicity, and inhabit deſarts; and in general among thoſe whoſe minds have been leaſt refin'd by education, &c. who are neither ambitious or rich enough to invent new modes, or follow thoſe invented by the great, and conſequently never deviate from thoſe of their anceſtors.

Moſt travellers have neglected to make the above-mention'd obſervations, looking upon 'em as trifles and unworthy of their regard. It muſt indeed be confeſs'd, that they are not of any value in themſelves, but whoever reflects but ever ſo little on the advantage which may accrue from thence for the illuſtration of antient writers, will ſoon agree with me, that they are worthy our enquiry and of being publiſh'd to the world.

I have uſed my utmoſt endeavours to inſtruct myſelf in the cuſtoms of the Indians, and have obſerv'd their moſt trite maxims with the utmoſt nicety. But it was impoſſible for me to ſee them in all their purity, ſince I did not go high enough into the country for that purpoſe; for the trade which they carry on perpetually with the Europeans, makes thoſe who inhabit the coaſts very remiſs in certain duties, and neglect a great many particulars which they before before obſerv'd with the utmoſt exactneſs: inſomuch that their proſelytes are generally neither chriſtians or religious heathens. This it is that increaſes the difficulty of making diſcoveries, not to mention that a man is oblig'd in ſome meaſure to make his informations himſelf, it being almoſt impoſſible to get any thing from them on that head, for moſt of theſe people are ſo much employ'd in traffic, that they almoſt engroſs all their thoughts; and their learned Bramins think they would profane their doctrine and laws, were they to divulge 'em to foreigners.

I have therefore been oblig'd to confine my enquiries to their moſt common actions and cuſtoms, and to draw moſt of my obſervations from thence, which we therefore may ſuppoſe will not amount to a great number.

I have gone no farther in my enquiries than the examining ſuch particulars as the Indians had in common with the antients, and particularly the Jews, without entring into that important queſtion, viz. Whether thoſe, who were carried into Aſſyria by Theglath-Phalaſſar, under Phaceus, ſon to Romelius, king of Iſrael; or whether thoſe whom Salmanazar ſent thither under the reign of Oſea, travelling among the Indians, did not communicate to 'em thoſe particulars wherein we have obſerv'd a conformity; or whether God, at the time of his giving a law to his people, did not enjoin 'em to obſerve ſeveral rules, which, being naturally good, had been already obſerv'd by other nations?

Several things might be alledg'd in favour of each of theſe opinions, but as they are reaſons drawn only from probability and veriſimilitude, and that 'tis impoſſible to bring one poſitive proof on that head, I thought proper to paſs over it.

Some will perhaps wonder that this work conſiſts only of detach'd obſervations, and of ſuch incidents as bear no relation to one another; but I thought it wou'd be beſt to draw 'em up in this manner, ſince every article treats of a particular ſubject, which has no connection with that which precedes or follows after it; not to mention that 'twou'd have been impoſſible to have connected theſe articles without employing long digreſſions: theſe, as they would have ill ſuited this place, ſo they would infallibly have diſguſted ſuch readers as love to find no more in a book than it ought to have; that is, what the title promiſes, or at leaſt ſomething that anſwers it in ſome meaſure.

Farther, I thought proper to [a] quote the paſſages I have borrowed from the Latin authors verbatim, eſpecially if they related to difficult ſubjects, wherein it is proper to know the real ſentiment of the author. As for thoſe paſſages of Greek authors which I have been oblig'd to tranſcribe, I have made uſe of the beſt verſions we have from that tongue; becauſe great numbers of very learned perſons are unacquainted with it. I am ſenſible that many of my readers will not reliſh theſe quotations; but then I am perſuaded they will be very agreeable to others, and that all ſuch as are acquainted with the affairs in queſtion, will be glad to form a judgment (without being oblig'd to have recourſe to the authors themſelves) whether I have given the true ſenſe of thoſe paſſages I quote, and if the conſequences I have drawn from thence are juſt.

The reader will perhaps wonder at my having made more reflections on the antients than on the Indians; and particularly in my firſt obſervations, wherein after having given a pretty ſuccinct account of all ſuch particulars as relate to India, I afterwards am very diffuſive upon antiquity: but the wonder will immediately ceaſe, when he recollects what I have already obſerv'd, viz. that the knowledge of the cuſtoms of the Indians was not abſtractedly of any uſe; that the only reaſon of my employing them, was to juſtify what is related of the antients, and illuſtrate 'em upon occaſion; in a word, that I had antiquity only in view.

As I have not always explain'd certain paſſages of the antients, in all theſe places in which the Indians are mention'd, and the conformity of thoſe people with the antients; a query will perhaps be made, Why I mention'd that conformity, ſince it cannot be of any any ſervice in illuſtrating the ſcriptures and the moſt antient writers? To this I anſwer, That tho' the chief deſign of my making theſe obſervations, was to find out the meaning of certain difficult paſſages in the antients, it nevertheleſs was not my only aim; for I alſo intended to ſatisfy thoſe who cannot perſuade themſelves that the heathens were as blind as they are repreſented; and to ſhew, that ſince there are great numbers in our days who embrace the moſt extravagant errors, there might have been others, equally blind and ſtupid, in former ages.

I muſt deſire the reader to take notice, that part of thoſe conſequences which I have drawn from the conformity between the cuſtoms of the Indians and thoſe of the Jews, and all the antient nations in general, are only given as ſo many conjectures; and that I don't blindly eſpouſe any of thoſe opinions mention'd in this diſſertation.

I ſhall further obſerve, that when, on the teſtimony of Quintus Curtius and Chares of Mitylene, I take notice in article 29th, of the drunkenneſs of the Indians, and of the famous debauch which was made after the death of Calenus, in honour of his obſequies, and that I affirm'd the conqueror drank an hundred and ninety two pints of wine, which I ſuppos'd to be the quantity of the four congii mention'd by Athenæus; I had regard to the character which that author gives thoſe people, for their prodigious drinking, rather than to the uſual quantity which that congius is generally ſuppos'd to contain, which ſtrictly is no more than four [a] pints and a half. So that the four congii would have amounted to no more than eighteen pints in all, which is not ſo mighty a wonder. Novellius Torquatus drank three congii or thirteen pints and a half at one draught before Tiberius, whence he was call'd Triconigiarius. And Julius Capitolinus in the life of Maximin, ſays, that he drank an amphora every day, containing eight congii, which amounted to 36 pints, according to the common way of computing. The reaſon of my ſuppoſing the four congii to make 192 pints, was, becauſe I imagin'd that the manner in which authors have written on that celebrated debauch, would not admit of a leſs quantity. In fine, I have, with other writers, allow'd the congius to contain ſix ſextaries, but ſuppoſe at the ſame time, every ſextary conſiſted of eighteen pints, in which I have follow'd our gaugers; as it would otherwiſe have been impoſſible for me to anſwer the idea which Chares of Mitylene would give us of that debauch. But I ſubmit the whole to the reader's judgment.

II. The Dominions of the Great Mogul.

THO' I have made a reſolution not to inſert any particulars among my remarks, but what relate to the conformity of the cuſtoms of the Indians with thoſe of the antients; nevertheleſs as the people in queſtion live under the government of the Great Mogul, I thought my ſelf indiſpenſibly oblig'd to give ſome account of that kingdom; at leaſt to give the reader a general idea of its beginning and extent.

Temur-Lengue, ſignifying a lame prince, call'd by corruption Tamerlane, was the founder of the empire of the Great Mogul. Certain authors pretend that he was deſcended from a noble and antient Tartarian family; but moſt hiſtorians [b] who mention him, have own'd that he was of very mean extraction, and that it was his merit only rais'd him to that pitch of grandeur.

He married the emperor of Great Tartary's daughter, one of the ſucceſſors of the famous Ginghis-Can, who firſt govern'd that empire. About anno Dom. 1400, he ſet himſelf at the head of the Moguls, a people who inhabited the eaſtern part of Great Tartary, and march'd with them into India, where, after having brought ſeveral petty kings kings of Indoſtan and of the neighbouring provinces under ſubjection, he at length laid the foundation of that vaſt empire, which at this day goes by the name of the empire of the Great Mogul.

[a] Pliny, lib. 14. cap. 22.

[b] However, ſuch as are converſant in the eaſtern writers, affirm that Tamerlane boaſted a very illuſtrious deſcent.

'Tis well known that Tamerlane took the famous Bajazet ſultan of the Turks priſoner, and that the Tartar, after having us'd his utmoſt endeavours to make his captivity leſs grievous, and if poſſible heal their diviſions; provok'd by the ſultan's haughtineſs and continual threats, he was at laſt oblig'd to impriſon him in an iron cage, and that Bajazet daſh'd out his own brains againſt one of the bars of it. Tamerlane had a very extenſive genius, was daring and intrepid, and bating ſome little tendency he had to cruelty, boaſted an irreproachable character.

The empire loſt much of its luſtre under his deſcendants, moſt of whom neglecting their military affairs, employ'd all their thoughts in inventing new ſcenes of pleaſure, and ſpent their whole lives in luxury and eaſe: but in the laſt century there aroſe a monarch, who abhorring the effeminacy of a great number of his predeceſſors, imitated not only the bravery and glorious atchievements of Tamerlane, but alſo the ſeverity of his adminiſtration; a prince, who not only reſtor'd the empire to its former luſtre, but alſo made great acquiſitions to it.

The monarch I mean is Aurengzeb. But before I proceed farther, it may not be improper to trace things a little higher, and to relate in what manner his father aſcended the throne, and was afterwards driven from it.

Chah-Jehan, who, before his being rais'd to the empire, was call'd Sultan Corom, was father to Aurengzeb. He was ſon to the Great Mogul, Jehan-Guire, whoſe ſucceſſor he might naturally have expected to be, and not to meet with the leaſt oppoſition; however, whether it were from an impatient deſire of reigning, or from ſome private reſentment, he rebell'd againſt his father. Unhappily for him his father happen'd to die whilſt he was engag'd in open rebellion againſt him; for thoſe who had govern'd the empire under Jehan-Guire, knowing Sultan Corom not to be their friend, they therefore caus'd Bulloqui, Jehan-Guire's grandſon, to be proclaimed emperor. This news was ſo far from diſpiriting Sultan Corom, that it only inflam'd him the more; he purſued Bulloqui, took him priſoner, and ſtrangled him, after he had reign'd three months; which being done, he was univerſally recogniz'd as Great Mogul, under the name of Chah-Jehan.

This monarch reign'd in peace ſo long as the tender years of his four ſons prevented their raiſing any commotions; but no ſooner were they grown to maturity, and were able to know what it is to reign and have command over others, but they all pretended to the empire. Dara, as being Chah-Jehan's eldeſt ſon, and the other three from a principle of ambition only.

They were four brothers, Dara was the eldeſt, Sultan Sujah the ſecond, Aurengzeb the third, and Morad-back-che the youngeſt; beſides which Chah-Jehan had two daughters, the eldeſt of whom was call'd Begum Saheb, a very proud, witty woman; the other was call'd Rauchenara Begum, and was one of the moſt beautiful princeſſes of her age.

Dara, Sultan Sujah, and Morad-back-che diſcover'd pretty manifeſt indications that they all aſpir'd to the empire, and intended to live independent; but Aurengzeb, who was a very ſubtle man, and inform'd with a very elevated genius, tho' it did not blaze out; and, at the ſame time, as ambitious as the reſt of his brethren; thought it beſt to appear outwardly as one entirely diveſted of all ſelf-intereſted principles, the better to ſucceed in his deſigns; nor was he any way miſtaken in his conjectures. In order therefore to remove all ſuſpicions, and to prevent his brothers from harbouring the leaſt diſtruſt with regard to him, he became a Faquir, or poor friar, and pretended to bid adieu to all pomp and grandeur. He was artful enough, whilſt he follow'd this way of life, to exaſperate his brothers ſo highly againſt each other, that they all took up arms, without ſcarce knowing the reaſon for their ſo doing.

Whilſt theſe diviſions continued, Aurengzeb always adher'd to the weakeſt ſide, publickly declaring, that as he had no farther pretenſions, all his views terminated in the public good, and the reſtoring of his father's affairs to their former tranquility. In the mean time he privately ſet every engine at work, in order to bribe as many friends as he poſſibly could to his intereſt, particularly the greateſt men of the empire. When he found himſelf ſtrong enough, and that the moſt conſiderable Omrahs, or generals of the Mogul, were reſolv'd to ſtand by him; he at laſt threw off the mask, and then it was his friends knew, but too late, that his only deſign in exaſperating 'em againſt each other, was only to pave the way to their ruin, and aggrandize himſelf.

The firſt ſtep he took was the keeping his father Chah-Jehan priſoner in a ſtrong-hold, whither he had withdrawn himſelf, and in which he died ſix years after. This monarch did not ſeem to merit pity, ſince he himſelf had before rebell'd againſt his father. Aurengzeb no ſooner found himſelf maſter of Chah-Jehan's perſon, but he endeavour'd to ſeize his brothers, and diſable 'em from interrupting the tranquility of his government, which he effected without any great difficulty. Dara was taken priſoner and afterwards poiſon'd; and Aurengzeb ſoon put it out of the power of the reſt to give him any diſturbance, ſo that he was proclaim'd Great Mogul in the year 1660. Bernier, and ſeveral other authors who have written on the Indies, have related the ſeveral particulars of Aurengzeb's wars againſt his brothers, and the artifices he employ'd to raiſe himſelf to the empire. He was living when I left Bengal, which was on the 10th of February 1702, but 'twas reported that he doated.

It cannot be deny'd but that this prince was one of the greateſt politicians and greateſt monarchs of his age; this is manifeſt from the account which hiſtorians have given of him. He is indeed reproach'd with having ruin'd his family, and with the great cruelty he exercis'd towards them, his father and his brother Dara in particular: but in this he had only follow'd the maxims of the greateſt part of the Eaſterns, who run all hazards when a throne is the reward of the victor.

If we were to compare Aurengzeb with any famous European prince, I believe we could not draw the parallel better than between him and Pope Sixtus the fifth; for as Aurengzeb gain'd the empire, by making the moſt public renunciation of it, and leading a retir'd life for ſome time; Sixtus in like manner got the pontificate by pretending he was not fit for it, and by living in the ſtricteſt ſolitude, tho' in the midſt of Rome, all the time he was cardinal. Aurengzeb did not reveal himſelf till after he was rais'd to the empire, or at leaſt not till ſuch time as his brothers were almoſt unable to diſpute the crown with him, and that he himſelf had made ſure of it. Sixtus did not diſcover himſelf, till he had got poſſeſſion of the triple crown, and the world was prodigiouſly ſurpriz'd to ſee ſo ſudden a change. They both put their reſpective dominions in a very flouriſhing condition; made themſelves be dreaded and reſpected by their ſubjects and the princes their neighbours; and tho' they were both cruel, and acted ſeveral things which in ſtrict juſtice are far from meriting applauſe, they yet have acquir'd immortal glory. Aurengzeb indeed made very great conqueſts, which Sixtus never did; but we are to conſider that the former has reign'd upwards of forty-two years, whereas the latter enjoy'd the pontificate no more than five; and happily too for ſeveral princes of Italy, particularly Spain, who probably, had he reign'd longer, wou'd have loſt Naples; a kingdom he as much thirſted after, as Aurengzeb did for that of Golconda, becauſe of its rich diamond mines: ſo that had he reign'd only a few years longer, he would perhaps have been as ſucceſsful in his enterprize as the Great Aurengzeb.

It would be difficult to determine whether a deſire of death or empire, which we meet with in moſt Eaſtern princes who have any pretenſions to the crown, may be owing to the pride and cruelty of thoſe monarchs under whom they are oblig'd to live; or whether that pride and cruelty which thoſe princes diſcover, flows from the inſatiable thirſt which the princes who are ſubject to 'em have after empire. 'Tis impoſſible to ſay whether the cruel and bloody adminiſtration of ſome princes be owing to the ficklenes, and little real affection of their ſubjects; or whether the inconſtancy and little affection of their ſubjects may not be the reſult of their cruel and bloody adminiſtrations. Some will perhaps ſay, How would it be poſſible for a monarch to reign with mildneſs and gentleneſs over ſuch ſubjects; ſubjects, who breathe nothing but rebellion? But then again others would ſay, What man but would endeavour to withdraw himſelf from the ſubjection to ſuch princes, as reign over him with a rod of iron, and how would it be poſſible for their ſubjects to love, and be faithful to them?

To this I believe we may anſwer, That the little real affection the Eaſterns generally diſcover for their kings, is owing to the pride and cruelty of their firſt monarchs, whoſe tyrannical ſpirit made ſo great an impreſſion on the minds of the people, that they afterwards conſider'd all the reſt of their princes as tyrants: ſo that their ſucceſſors were indiſpenſably oblig'd, in order to divert the fatal conſequences of the ill impreſſion which the tyranny of their anceſtors had made on their minds, to tread in their ſteps; or, in other words, to uſe their ſubjects like ſlaves; to keep 'em in perpetual terrors and apprehenſions, and to imitate the cruelty and barbarity of their predeceſſors. Thus the inclement adminiſtration of the firſt monarchs rais'd fear and ſuſpicion in the minds of their ſubjects: and, on the other ſide, this fear and ſuſpicion in the ſubject, was afterwards the cauſe of the monarch's cruelty.

Moreover, the Eaſterns are in general more effeminate, and fonder of pleaſure, than other nations; and conſequently leſs capable of that real and ſolid virtue, which is as neceſſary to a good ſubject as a great monarch: for if a vaſt fund of knowledge and ſtrength of mind be requir'd in thoſe who would command over others according to the principles of juſtice and lenity; as much of both is requir'd in thoſe who would be juſtly obedient; and there is at leaſt as much greatneſs of ſoul in being a good ſubject, as a good monarch.

But tho' kings had nothing to fear from the wicked intentions of ſubjects, yet many would be almoſt forc'd to be cruel: for ſubjects obey only from theſe two motives; either from a conſciouſneſs of the real lenity of their ſovereign, which conſequently demands ſubmiſſion and obedience; or from the knowledge they have of their cruelty, which naturally commands awe; inſomuch that ſeveral eaſtern princes, not being endued with good qualities ſufficient to keep their ſubjects in obedience, they would always be forc'd, as it were, to reign over them in a cruel and tyrannical manner.

The dominions of the Great Mogul extend eaſtward to the other ſide of the river Ganges, and have the Ocean to the ſouth, Macran and Candahar to the weſt, and Tartary to the north. Agra and Delli are the two chief cities of the empire, and both have the title of capital.

I believe we may ſafely affirm, that the dominions of the Great Mogul are the richeſt in the world; for not only almoſt all the nations of Europe, but thoſe of Aſia carry gold and ſilver thither, and never have any thing but goods in return; ſo that this empire is as a kind of gulph, into which all the riches of the univerſe are thrown, and whence none are return'd.

III. Of Circumciſion.

CIRCUMCISION is not practis'd by the heathen Indians, at leaſt by thoſe whom I frequented. I nevertheleſs thought proper to take notice of circumciſion as uſed by the inhabitants of Guinea, and the country thro' which I paſs'd. From this and ſome other inſtances which I ſhall now mention, ſome criticks have pretended to prove that circumciſion was not peculiar to the Jews; and that, independent from the command which God had laid upon Abraham to obſerve it, 'twas uſed by other nations, and by them conſider'd as a natural expedient to facilitate procreation.

But before I examine the paſſages which the above-mention'd quote in favour of their opinion, and the inſtances they produce to corroborate it, I believe it may not be improper to take ſome notice of circumciſion in general; and the time of its inſtitution; and to weigh and conſider the words of ſcripture which relate thereto.

Circumciſion is not once mention'd in the bible before Abraham's time, whom God enjoin'd to inſtitute this ceremony as a teſtimony of the future alliance between him and the deſcendants of that holy patriarch. [a] The reaſon therefore why God commanded the Jews to uſe circumciſion, was, that it might be a ſign, and token of the alliance which the creator had made between Abraham and his poſterity. Nothing is there mention'd with regard to its particular advantages. In the ſame chapter God threatens to liſt up his vengeful arm againſt thoſe who ſhall not conform to this inſtitution, by ſaying [b], That he ſhall be rooted out from among the people. And indeed when Moſes, by God's command, came away from among the Midianites, in order to deliver the people from their rigorous Egyptian bondage; the angel of the Lord would have kill'd his ſon in their journey, becauſe he was uncircumcis'd: nor would Zipporah have appeas'd the juſt anger of heaven [c], had ſhe not immediately circumcis'd him with a ſharp ſtone.

We may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that the Midianites did not uſe circumciſion, for otherwiſe 'tis very probable that Jethro, who was prieſt of Midian, would not have ſuffer'd his grandſon to have remain'd uncircumcis'd in oppoſition to cuſtom. Beſides, had Moſes liv'd in a country where circumciſion was practis'd, he would certainly have had the child circumcis'd, eſpecially if we conſider how zealouſly he adher'd to the religion of his fore-fathers; ſo that we may naturally ſuppoſe, the only reaſon why he was not circumcis'd, was becauſe 'twas not uſed in the country where he dwelt.

The Sichemites, who inhabited the land of Canaan, were not enjoin'd circumciſion, nor would they all have ſubmitted to that law, had it not been that they might reſemble the family of Jacob; and that [d] Shechem, ſon to Hamor, prince of the country, might marry Dinah. Neither were the Philiſtines circumcis'd; nor were they better known to the Jews by the name of uncircumcis'd, than by that of their country: thus after Saul had loſt the battle, he bid his [e] armour-bearer kill him, to prevent his falling alive into the hands of the Philiſtines, and of being made the ſcorn and ſport of thoſe uncircumcis'd. In fine, one wou'd imagine, that by the word uncircumcis'd, the Jews underſtood all other nations, or at leaſt ſuch as were not of the poſterity of Abraham. Neverthelefs I wou'd not infer from hence, that the Jews only uſed circumciſion, but only that this practice was inſtituted among them, purpoſely to diſtinguiſh them from other nations; and that if 'twas uſed by other people, they firſt borrow'd it from the Jews, as I ſhall now endeavour to prove.

Some have pretended that circumciſion was not peculiar to the Jews; or, in other words, that ſeveral other nations had uſed it, independent from the injunction which God had laid upon Abraham to that purpoſe. Thoſe who favour this opinion, endeavour to ſupport it from ſeveral paſſages of the antients; and moreover they inſtance ſeveral other nations who practiſe it in our days; and even maintain, that it is abſolutely neceſſary for ſome people, who otherwiſe would not be able to propagate their kind.

Herodotus [f] mentions circumciſion, and ſays, that the inhabitants of Colchos, Egypt, and Ethiopia, were the only people who firſt uſed it. He afterwards adds, that he could not affirm which of thoſe nations firſt practis'd it, it appearing to be of great antiquity antiquity among them all: nevertheleſs, that as the Ethiopians and the inhabitants of Colchos had carried on a great trade, and been very converſant with the Egyptians, he imagines they might have borrow'd it from them, and conſequently that it came firſt from Egypt. This [a] author founds his conjecture, in that of the ſeveral nations who had any correſpondence with the Egyptians, the Phœnicians only uſed circumciſion; and at the ſame time, that it was not uſed by thoſe who frequented the Greeks only.

Diodorus Siculus [b] ſpeaking of the Troglodites, tells us, that they uſed circumciſion in the ſame manner as the Egyptians. Theſe Troglodites inhabited that part of Africa, which now goes by the name of the coaſt of Abex or Abexim, being the eaſtern part of Abyſſinia. And we are likewiſe told, that the celebrated Thales got himſelf circumciſed in order that he might appear leſs ſavage to the learned Egyptians, nor ſo much a foreigner in their eyes, [c] in order to get the eaſier acceſs to their perſons, by thus imitating them in ſo great a ceremony, and to enable himſelf the better to pry into their myſteries.

'Tis therefore particularly on theſe paſſages, and others of the like nature, that ſome learned criticks of our days have founded their opinions to prove, as was before obſerv'd, that circumciſion was uſed by ſeveral other nations, independent from the Jews, and the injunction which God had laid upon 'em; pretending even, that 'twas abſolutely neceſſary to certain nations for the propagation of their ſpecies. Let us now ſee what anſwer may be made to the conſequences which they pretend to draw from theſe authorities. There were but three reaſons which could induce men to make uſe of circumciſion; viz. firſt, in obedience to the religion which they profeſs'd; 2dly, the impoſſibility there was of getting children without this practice; or, laſtly, the example of the people among whom they dwelt, and the idea they had form'd to themſelves of that ceremony.

We have no reaſon to believe, that the Egyptians were enjoin'd to circumciſe their children by their law, nor can the knowledge we have at this time of their religion and cuſtoms, give us any light into this matter; neither could the impoſſibility of procreating children without this practice, have oblig'd the Egyptians to uſe circumciſion, ſince they were not form'd differently in thoſe days from what they are at this time; and 'tis certain, that they do not now want it to aſſiſt procreation, ſince there are at this time great numbers of chriſtians in Egypt who don't practiſe it; and that they are as populous now as they were antiently, when they uſed circumciſion. If it ſhould be otherwiſe, it can be owing to nothing elſe than to the great number of young people who are carried away from thence into ſlavery, and not to the impotency of their men. We may therefore ſuppoſe, that the Egyptians only circumciſed themſelves in imitation of the Jews among whom they lived; and indeed ſuch a ſuppoſition is much more probable than the other two.

To perſuade ourſelves that the Egyptians copy'd circumciſion from the Jews, or at leaſt to admit of this laſt opinion in prejudice to the other two, we need only make ſome reflections on their character, and the ſtrong impreſſion which every circumſtance that happen'd among them with regard to the Iſraelites, might have made upon their minds.

The Egyptians have in all ages been the moſt ſuperſtitious, and at the ſame time the moſt fond of myſteries of any people that ever lived, and conſequently the moſt apt to receive any new impreſſions in religious matters. On the other ſide, the moſt dreadful and ſurprizing cataſtrophes that ever befel any nation, happen'd in their country at the time of Moſes's being among them; ſo that we may naturally ſuppoſe, that the aſtoniſhing actions which that great law-giver wrought, and in general every circumſtance that was any way relative to him, made the deepeſt impreſſions on their minds.

The

[a] Herodotus, Book 2. [b] Book. iv. c. 2.
[c] Clemens Alexand. Stromat, lib. 1.

The prodigies which were wrought by the hand of that great man, the army of Pharaoh drown'd in the Red-Sea, the death of all the firſt-born, the darkneſs which overſpread Egypt, and in fine, all the methods he employ'd to deliver the people of Iſrael out of captivity; all theſe circumſtances could not fail of ſtriking the minds of the Egyptians with great terror, and giving the learned a high idea of the author of ſuch miracles: and as all the antient heathens in general did not ſcruple to rank in the number of their deities all thoſe of other nations whom they thought powerful; and to embrace ſome principles of their religion; we hence may, methinks, ſuppoſe, that the Egyptians, ſtruck with that croud of wonders which the Iſraelites had perform'd before their eyes, borrow'd ſome of their principal ceremonies, and thoſe particularly which diſtinguiſh'd the children of Iſrael from other nations. Now as circumciſion was the moſt eſſential characteriſtic of the Jewiſh religion, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that they adher'd particularly to that ceremony.

To this we may add, that 'tis very probable circumciſion was not uſed by the Egyptians, before the children of Iſrael left their country; and we may ground this conjecture on a circumſtance mention'd in Joſhua. The ſcripture informs us, that Joſhua cauſed all the Iſraelites to be circumciſed after their croſſing the Jordan, and that becauſe this ceremony had not been obſerv'd in the deſart; and that the Lord ſaid to the worthy ſucceſſor of Moſes after their circumciſion, [a] That he had that day taken away the reproach of Egypt from among them. Methinks nothing but the fore-skin could be meant by this reproach of Egypt, which circumciſion had taken away; and if the Jews look'd upon that part as the reproach of the Egyptians, we may naturally ſuppoſe that the Egyptians had it, and conſequently did not uſe circumciſion at that time. But if they did not uſe circumciſion when the children of Egypt left their country, and that we can ſtill prove that they afterwards practis'd it; we may, I preſume, conclude from thence, as has been already obſerv'd, that all the miracles which Moſes wrought among them, gave 'em ſo high an idea both of his perſon and religion, as engag'd 'em to copy the moſt peculiar characteriſtic in their religion, and to appropriate to themſelves what diſtinguiſhed them chiefly from other nations; and this undoubtedly was circumciſion.

The reader will poſſibly at firſt make the following objections to the arguments which have been now offer'd, viz. That they are no more than reaſons of mere probability, and conſequently are not concluſive, to prove that the Egyptians borrow'd circumciſion from the Jews; and that they did not uſe it independently from the precept which had been given to Abraham for that purpoſe. I am not inſenſible, that the reaſons I have here offer'd cannot be conſider'd as ſo many certain and poſitive proofs; however I believe, that when there is no poſſibility of our attaining to a phyſical certainty of a thing, we in that caſe ought always to adhere to thoſe circumſtances in it which appear the moſt probable: and I think there is much more probability in ſaying, that the Egyptians borrow'd circumciſion from the Jews who liv'd among 'em, and to whoſe miracles they themſelves had been eye-witneſſes; miracles, that were infinitely greater than any which their prieſts and enchanters could work; than to admit that the Egyptians had it independently from the Jews, and that too without any ſtrong reaſon for ſo doing. For, in fine, if we are for laying any ſtreſs on that paſſage of Herodotus, which is the moſt antient and moſt authentic proof that the favourers of this laſt opinion can alledge; yet the only inference we can draw from thence, is, that the Egyptians made uſe of circumciſion. But ſtill this is no argument of their having that ceremony from themſelves, and independent from the Jewiſh religion. Had we ſome inſtance, or ſome paſſage which mention'd the circumciſion of the Egyptians, before the coming of the children of Jacob into Egypt, we then might conclude, that as the above-mention'd nation nation practis'd circumciſion, before they had any correſpondence with the Iſraelites, they conſequently did not borrow that ceremony from them. But we meet with nothing like this; and Herodotus, who wrote about two hundred and forty years after the foundation of Rome, and conſequently about 1018 or 1020 years after the Iſraelites left Egypt, makes no farther mention of the Egyptians than that they uſed circumciſion, but without taking any notice of the time when it firſt began among them, or whence they firſt borrow'd it: ſo that, to me, the argument in queſtion receives no manner of force from the paſſage of this author, nor can any thing be drawn from thence in favour of that opinion.

A further objection may be, viz. that circumciſion was practis'd not only by the Egyptians, but alſo by thoſe of Colchos and Ethiopia, as Herodotus informs us; but this will not be of more ſervice to them, ſince the ſame author obſerves, that he is not very ſure, and cannot poſitively affirm, whether the ceremony firſt took its riſe among the Egyptians or the Ethiopians; notwithſtanding that it appears probable to him, that it was firſt uſed by the Egyptians, and that the Ethiopians borrow'd it from them, becauſe circumciſion was practis'd by thoſe nations only who frequented the Egyptians. If the Ethiopians receiv'd it from the Egyptians, we are not to quote the example of thoſe people, to prove that circumciſion was uſed independently from the Jewiſh doctrine, ſince it will always be ſuppos'd, that the Egyptians, from whom other nations had taken it, had themſelves borrow'd it from the Jews.

Diodorus Siculus mentions the circumciſion of the Troglodytes; but adds, as has been already obſerv'd, that they perform'd it in the ſame manner as the Egyptians, from whom, 'tis very probable, they might have borrow'd it, theſe two nations not being at a great diſtance from one another.

We know that the Negroes of Guinea uſe circumciſion, but then 'tis that of Mahomet, and we have no arguments to prove that they had that inſtitution among them before his time. 'Tis certain that they have embrac'd, at leaſt imperfectly, the Mahometan religion, for I my ſelf have ſeen phylacteries about their arms and necks, written in very good Arabic characters, which contain certain invocations out of the Alcoran. Imperfectly, I ſay, becauſe 'tis certain there are ſtill ſeveral heatheniſh ceremonies among them, ſuch as, for inſtance, the cuſtom of ſacrificing to devils, in order to prevent their hurting them, and ſeveral others of the ſame kind.

We therefore have no argument or proof to engage us to think that the Negroes made uſe of circumciſion before Mahomet's time: but tho' it were ſo, yet this would not prove, that it was independent from the injunction laid upon Abraham; for they might have borrowed it from the Ethiopians that lie moſt to the eaſt, and who traded with the Jews. Nay, ſeveral of that nation made a public profeſſion of the Jewiſh doctrine, and uſed to go regularly to worſhip at Jeruſalem, as is manifeſt from the Acts of the Apoſtles; and even ſeveral perſons of great diſtinction among them had embrac'd thoſe principles. As for inſtance, [a] the Eunuch of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, was coming from worſhipping at Jeruſalem when St. Philip met him reading the prophet Iſaiah. As therefore ſeveral Ethiopians read the ſcriptures and the Jewiſh law, and not ſatisfy'd with worſhipping in thoſe temples which they might have in their own country, went alſo to worſhip at that of Jeruſalem; 'tis natural to believe that they had a very exalted idea of the Jewiſh religion, and a great veneration for its ceremonies: and as mankind generally endeavour to imitate whatever is the object of their eſteem and admiration; 'tis very probable that they obey'd the injunction of circumciſion, as it is ſo frequently inculcated in thoſe ſacred writings, and in the books of that law for which they expreſs'd ſo much eſteem and veneration.

'Twou'd

[a] Act. viii. 27. Et ecce vir Æthiops, Eunuchus potens Candacis Reginæ Æthiopum, qui erat ſuper omnes gazas ejus, venerat adorare in Jeruſalem, &c.

'Twou'd be to no purpoſe to object here, that Herodotus did not affirm that the Ethiopians had borrow'd circumciſion from the Jews, but from the Egyptians; for I humbly preſume, that the conſequences which are drawn from ſcripture, will be preferr'd to thoſe of Herodotus, who, tho' generally call'd the father of Hiſtorians, is nevertheleſs well known, not to have always ſtrictly adher'd to truth, but that he has as frequently err'd in his deſcriptions of times, nations and empires, as Pliny has in thoſe of nature. Moreover, it will be no difficult matter, without enquiring which of thoſe two authorities are of greateſt credit, to reconcile them together: for as it may eaſily have happen'd, that the Ethiopians firſt borrow'd circumciſion from the Egyptians; ſo it may likewiſe have fallen out afterwards, that this people hearing that the Egyptians themſelves had firſt borrow'd it from the Jews, might have ſought the acquaintance of the latter in order to obtain from them, in all its purity, thoſe things whereof the Egyptians could give them but a very imperfect account; who, in all probability, intermixing it with their idle conceits, had form'd to themſelves a new religion out of the two old ones.

Some, in order to prove that the Negroes practis'd circumciſion independent from the Jewiſh law, have maintain'd, that they were forc'd to it from neceſſity, it being impoſſible for them otherwiſe to get [a] children: but 'tis certain, that thoſe who alledg'd this circumſtance, were not acquainted with them. For they are ſhap'd exactly as we are; and not only in Guinea, but in all thoſe parts of Aſia and America which I viſited, in all which places tho' I took care to get the moſt exact informations poſſible, with regard to the defect which is aſcrib'd to the inhabitants of the hot countries, I yet could never hear of any thing of [b] that nature. I cannot indeed affirm ſo preciſely with regard to Egypt and the country of the antient Troglodytes, becauſe I never frequented thoſe countries; but I can at leaſt affirm, that I have ſpoke with people who have viſited them, and theſe all aſſur'd me they had never heard the leaſt mention of any ſuch defect.

Others have gone ſo far as to advance, that circumciſion was equally neceſſary to the Jews; but then we muſt ſuppoſe an incredible number of miracles, or elſe make a continual one for forty years together; for they did not once uſe circumciſion all the time they were in the deſart, which however was no obſtacle to their getting children. Beſides, ſeveral Jews had children after they had embrac'd chriſtianity; and theſe children, tho' not circumcis'd, did nevertheleſs propagate their ſpecies when they were of an age requiſite for that purpoſe. Conſequently circumciſion was not abſolutely neceſſary to theſe people in order to their getting children, ſince they increas'd their poſterity without it.

If ever there were room to ſuppoſe that the Jewiſh ceremonies were no more than types, under which greater things were ſhadow'd than what they appear'd to be naturally, or preſages of things to come, 'tis undoubtedly in that of circumciſion; which was no more than a ceremony, by which God ſignified to his people, that they ſhould cut away from their hearts all ſuch things as were not relative to their great end, or to thoſe things for which they were created. The reader is not to conſider this as the figurative explication of any particular perſon, or the wild liberty of ſome interpreter, who ſometimes changes the ſenſe of the ſcriptures as caprice ſhall dictate, and moulds it according to his own fancy; no, God himſelf expreſſes himſelf in this manner, by the mouth of his ſervant Moſes. [c] Circumciſe therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no more ſtiff-necked. I own it may be objected, that 'tis very poſſible for circumciſion to have been a natural help to procreation, and at the ſame time a type how mankind ought to behave with regard to their hearts; but as we have have proofs that circumciſion was not neceſſary for procreation, and that 'tis evident the Jews could diſpenſe with it for a conſiderable number of years; I therefore think we ought to infer, that it was in reality, no more than a type, to teach man, as was already obſerv'd, to cut away from his heart whatever did not carry him to his ultimate end, viz. God.

[c] Deut. x. 16. Circumcidite igitur præputium cordis veſtri, & cervicem veſtram ne induretis amplius.

Some will perhaps ſay, that the ceremony of circumciſion was not indeed abſolutely neceſſary for procreation with regard to the Jews, but only a means of facilitating it. Philo appears to be of this opinion in the end of his book de ſpecialibus legibus. [a] He firſt obſerves, that certain people laugh at circumciſion, notwithſtanding it was had in great honour by ſeveral nations, the Egyptians in particular. By the way, we are to obſerve, that we may alſo conclude from this paſſage in Philo, that the Egyptians borrow'd circumciſion from the Jews, ſince he ſays expreſſly, that the circumciſion of his anceſtors was honour'd by the Egyptians.

This author produces ſeveral natural reaſons of circumciſion, in order to prove to foreign nations that it ought not to appear ſo very extraordinary in their eyes. He obſerves, that it was not only inſtituted to denote the covenant between God and the Jews, but alſo to preſerve the body in [b] health and free it from impurities.

Now, to anſwer theſe paſſages, we are to obſerve, that his deſign in this was to juſtify the uſe of circumciſion to certain foreigners who were very much ſhock'd at the practice of it; and therefore, without inſiſting very much on the reaſons of that inſtitution, ſince they would not have been reliſh'd by perſons who profeſs'd a religion which differ'd vaſtly from his own; he therefore was oblig'd to give ſome natural reaſons for it, in moſt of which he nevertheleſs ſeems to be pretty much miſtaken. I would not allow of the firſt reaſon he gives, viz. that it preſerves from ſeveral diſeaſes which are hard to be cured: ſo far from it, that in my opinion, 'twou'd be the very contrary; but this is properly the province of the phyſician. Beſides, ſuppoſing it to have been ſo, 'twas giving themſelves a great deal of trouble, and taking great precautions beforehand, for the better healing of a diſeaſe, from which they might eaſily have preſerv'd themſelves; not to mention that they were never afflicted with it but 'twas their own fault.

The ſecond reaſon is much more probable, in as much as the Eaſterns, and among theſe the Jews and Egyptians, were very ſcrupulous with regard to the purity and cleanlineſs of their prieſts. However, if they were ſo very ſcrupulous as that comes to, 'tis, methinks, ſurprizing they did not carry it ſtill further, and imitate the prieſts of Arcadia or Gaul.

As to his laſt reaſon, 'tis of no manner of weight; to prove the falſity of it, we need only reflect a little on the pretended fruitfulneſs of ſuch nations as uſed circumciſion. The Jews, the Turks, the Arabians, and all thoſe nations who practiſe circumciſion, are not more prolific than others; ſo far from it, that I am perſuaded, were we to make a diligent enquiry into that article, the very contrary would be found. But Philo was oblig'd to employ ſuch reaſons, whether good or bad, as he thought made for his purpoſe, to oppoſe ſuch as did not approve of that ceremony, and who would not have admitted any which bore ever ſo little relation to religion, and that covenant which God had made with Abraham and his poſterity; this being the ſtanding object of ridicule to the heathens, and to the Romans in particular, ſo that we are not to wonder that all thoſe which he alledges have no great foundation.

Of

IV. Of the chief Cauſes of Paganiſm and Idolatry.

AS the obſervations I have made with regard to India, do all relate to the cuſtoms of the heathen nations; and that the greateſt part of theſe cuſtoms are founded on paganiſm, and are even a conſequence thereof; it may not be improper to make ſome mention of idolatry in general, and the principal cauſes of its fatal eſtabliſhment.

There are few evils in religion, but what aroſe from ſome kind of good; and few errors but were founded on ſome truth, either ill underſtood, or corrupted by length of time.

In this manner, the fabulous hiſtory of the gods, their deſcent, their diviſions, victims, and thoſe fictions which were ſung by antient poets, were all founded on truth, which is the ſource of that religion we profeſs at this time. Nevertheleſs, the heathens have ſo much diſguis'd truth, by the numberleſs idle conceits and fictions with which they have clouded her, and her features are ſo much alter'd, that 'tis almoſt impoſſible to know her under this falſe dreſs.

'Tis pretty ſurprizing how ſo great a change cou'd ever have been wrought in religion, and that men ſhould leave the pure and clear light of truth, to plunge themſelves in an abyſs of errors, and a chaos of numberleſs fictions; nevertheleſs, a little reflection on the character of the generality of mankind, and on the corruption which time brings down along with it, will leſſen the wonder conſiderably.

The firſt cauſe of error, is, the little care which men take to judge from reflection only, and their being ſuch perpetual ſlaves to ſenſe. He muſt have ſomething to act upon him outwardly, and whenever truth ceaſes to exhibit herſelf by exterior ſigns, he chuſes rather to be affected with falſhood, than to let his ſenſes remain in a ſtate of inactivity, and to judge independant from them. This, perhaps, was the reaſon, why God, who knows the moſt hidden receſſes of our hearts, and its leaſt impulſes, heighten'd the Jewiſh religion with an almoſt numberleſs multitude of ceremonies, which to us appear needleſs. God was for fixing the ſenſes on ſome good object, that might guide them to truth; and to prevent their being affected with any thing pernicious, or which might be capable of leading them into error.

Another cauſe of idolatry, was the idea which men had always form'd to themſelves of the divine Being. They wanted a God; and were perſuaded of the certainty of ſuch a Being, from the voice of univerſal nature; the heavens, the earth, the regular motion of the ſtars, and that unerring order and harmony in the univerſe, were all ſo many teſtimonies of his exiſtence. But their ſtrongeſt and moſt convincing proof, was, thoſe ſecret impulſes of the heart, which carry'd them, as it were, in ſpite of themſelves, to ſomething of a higher and more auguſt nature than theſe creatures which were born, grew up, and died before their eyes; for idolatry did not firſt begin by the worſhipping the creatures, mankind being very ſenſible of their corruption. They did not immediately fall into thoſe groſs errors which took their riſe among the Egyptians, and which the Greeks, and afterwards the Romans, carried to the higheſt pitch of extravagance; for they at firſt worſhipp'd ſuch things only as to them appear'd fit objects for adoration.

The firſt things that men ador'd were the ſun, the moon, and ſtars; but as they could not always have the ſight of thoſe luminous bodies, they ſought for ſomething that might compenſate, in ſome meaſure, for thoſe moments when they were hid from them, and which, at the ſame time, might be an hieroglyphic of thoſe imaginary deities.

They cou'd not think of any thing that reſembled them more than fire, or which exhibited a more ſenſible mark of the ſplendor of the ſtars, and that of the ſun in particular;

ticular; ſo that they pitch'd upon fire for the object. This element was at firſt reſpected only as the repreſentative of the planet they worſhipp'd, but it afterwards became inſenſibly the object of their adoration. The Chaldeans firſt pointed out the way; and Ur in Chaldea, whence Abraham came, was the place where that firſt worſhip began; for which reaſon it was call'd Ur, that is to ſay, Fire.

[a] I ſhall here mention an incident, which indeed is pleaſant enough, as related by Euſebius on occaſion of fire, which the Chaldeans look'd upon as a Divinity. This people aſſerted, that their God was the ſtrongeſt and moſt powerful of all the Gods, ſince they had not met with any one that could reſiſt its force; ſo that whenever they happen'd to get any deities worſhipp'd by other nations, they immediately threw them into the fire, which never fail'd of conſuming them to aſhes; by which means the God of the Chaldeans was publickly look'd upon as the conqueror of all other Gods. But a prieſt of [b] Canopus (one of the Egyptian Gods) in which there was alſo a city of the ſame name, found out the art to deſtroy the great reputation the fire had acquir'd. For this purpoſe he caus'd an idol to be made of a very porous earth, with which pots were commonly made, which were employ'd to purify the water of the Nile. The belly of this ſtatue, which was very capacious, was fill'd with water; here the prieſt made a great number of little holes, and ſtopt them with wax; after which he challeng'd the fire of the Chaldeans to diſpute the victory with his God Canopus. The Chaldeans immediately prepar'd one, and the Egyptian prieſt ſet his ſtatue to it. No ſooner was the fire come to the wax but it diſſolv'd it, the holes were open'd, the water paſs'd thro', and at laſt quite put out the fire. Upon this a report was ſoon ſpread, that the God Canopus had conquer'd and deſtroy'd that of the Chaldeans; and the Egyptians, as a memorial of that ſignal victory, always made all their idols with very great bellies, and very ſhort little feet, that which had conquer'd the fire being ſo ſhap'd. The greateſt part of the idols of the Indians are alſo made after that manner.

The Perſians alſo worſhipp'd [c] fire, which was generally carried before their kings, and at the head of their armies, and was always attended by three hundred and ſixty prieſts. There are at this day ſome Perſians who ſtill adhere to the antient religion of the nation, but then they are a kind of ſavages, who inhabit the mountains, and would never receive the Alcoran. The Athenians had a perpetual fire in the Prytanæum, a kind of fortreſs, and their council-houſe, wherein alſo their old officers, and all ſuch as had done any ſignal ſervice to the common-wealth were maintain'd. This fire was kept by widows, whereas that of the Romans was under the care of virgins, call'd, Veſtals. 'Tis well known that the Jews were alſo commanded to keep a perpetual fire, as is manifeſt from the ſixth chapter of Leviticus.

Some have aſſerted, that the worſhip and adoration which ſo many nations paid to fire, was founded on this paſſage in [d] Deuteronomy, Thy God, O Iſrael! is a [e] conſuming fire. But that is no way probable, ſince, as it has been already obſerv'd, the Chaldeans worſhipp'd fire, long before the written law was given.

Afterwards man became the object of religious worſhip, but we ſhall ſpeak of the origin of this idolatry under the head of the Penates or houſhold gods. In fine, mankind at laſt came by inſenſible degrees to worſhip beaſts, and the very refuſe of nature.

All

[a] Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 11. c. 26.

[b] Siris, Oſiris, Canope, were the ſame deity under different names, all which are thought to be the Nile.

[c] 'Tis the practice at this day to carry a fire at the head of the caravans in the Eaſt. The Arabians and other people obſerve likewiſe that cuſtom when they march. 'Tis probable that the pillar of fire which walked in the night-time before the Iſraelites in the deſart, might have given riſe to it. God has been pleaſed, on ſeveral occaſions, to conform to a ſervile cuſtom which the antient Jews have adopted in almoſt every branch of their behaviour, and which has frequently led them to idolatry. Were we well aſſur'd that the fire which walk'd before the Iſraelites was ſhap'd like a pillar, we then poſſibly might have room to juſtify the Indians for repreſenting ſome of their gods under that form.

[d] Chap. 12. v. 19.

[e] We are of opinion, and with ſome foundation, that this expreſſion of the ſcripture alludes to the religion of thoſe people who worſhipp'd fire.

All theſe irregularities which men gave into are likewiſe owing to the lofty ſtyle of the eaſtern languages, to the ſcruples of whole nations, and to the great veneration they paid to every thing their prieſts or elders told them. The ſtyle of the Eaſterns, but particularly that of their prieſts, and of thoſe whom we may call their philoſophers, has in all ages been ſwell'd with figures and ſimiles. They ſearch'd only for pompous terms and metaphorical expreſſions, and the leſs they were underſtood by the people, the more learned and witty they thought them. Afterwards the firſt poets aroſe, who improv'd upon all this numberleſs rhapſody of pompous words and hyperboles, when at laſt 'twas found, that mens words were directly contradictory to their thoughts. [a] Lactantius inveighs ſtrongly againſt the evils which Poets have occaſion'd, and ſays, that people, who do not give themſelves time to reflect, may eaſily be inſnar'd by their ſoft, agreeable, and inſinuating manner of writing.

The generality of mankind did not ſearch into the ſenſe ſhadowed under the figure, and what it repreſented, but conſider'd the figure itſelf; ſo that we may judge what kind of notions they form'd to themſelves with regard to God and myſteries. For were we only to follow the literal ſenſe of the deſcription which the ſcripture gives of God, we ſhould figure him arm'd with a ſharp ſword, a ſhield, a bow, and arrows, and ſometimes lying in ambuſh. We there ſometimes ſee him gay, at other times angry or ſad. In a word, we ſhould at laſt go ſo far as to make a mere man of him, and very often, were we to ſtick to the letter, a man of no great wiſdom. This however the heathens have done; for they have really aſcrib'd ſuch things to God, as were ſpoken of him in a figurative ſenſe only. They began by giving him a body, which was founded firſt on the deſcriptions their prieſts and poets gave of him, and ſecondly on the natural tendency they had to judge independent from their ſenſes, and of forming to themſelves only ſuch ideas as were groſs and material.

Having thus ſeen man aſcribe a body to the Deity, we are not to wonder at the odd figures under which they repreſented him, and the different functions they aſcrib'd to him. 'Tis well known, that there were of all kinds, inſomuch that at laſt there was not any part of the houſe but was guarded by its peculiar God or Goddeſs. Nay, they even went ſo far, as to put thoſe places which are deſign'd for the eaſing of nature, under the direction of a Goddeſs, to whom they gave the name of Cloacina: in fine, they carried their extravagance to the utmoſt lengths. Tertullian, Lactantius, and even ſeveral profane writers, have given us the particulars of all theſe ridiculous and idle chimæras.

We ſhall take notice of the veneration which the people had for every thing that came from their prieſts or elders, when we come to ſpeak of their tutelar Divinities. This veneration, as has been already obſerv'd, was one of the cauſes of their great fondneſs for error, and the fictions they had receiv'd from their anceſtors. But enough has been ſaid on a ſubject which has been thoroughly handled by very learned authors in our age. We find in their works, all the extravagance and ridiculous foppery of paganiſm, and at the ſame time ſee how widely the belief of perſons of good ſenſe, differ'd from that of the common people.

V. The

V. The Sacrifices of the Indians, and their Manner of honouring their Gods.

MANKIND have in all ages paid an outward worſhip to the Deity; which conſiſted in offering up to him their beſt and moſt valuable things, as an acknowledgement that they were indebted to him for them. Thus Cain, whoſe employment was to till the ground, offer'd part of his fruits to God; and Abel, who kept ſheep, made him a ſacrifice of one of his fatteſt lambs.

'Tis not certain, whether there were any fix'd ceremonies at the riſe of oblations, and there is even room to believe, that [a] Enos firſt reduc'd them under a regular form. [b] Father Petau has indeed taken it in another ſenſe, viz. underſtanding hereby, that this grandſon of Adam's reſtor'd the worſhip of God which the children of Cain had aboliſh'd.

There was alſo another kind of ſacrifice, call'd the ſacrifice of Libation. This was perform'd by pouring out ſome liquor in honour of the Deity, and was alſo uſed under the written law.

As for inſtance, after the ark of the covenant was return'd, the Iſraelites aſſembled together at Mizpeh, under Samuel, in order to return thanks to God for reſcuing them out of the hands of the Philiſtines; [c] the ſcripture takes notice, that they drew water and poured it out before the Lord, by way of thankſgiving for his mercies.

The water which David poured out when he was before Bethlehem, and which he refuſed to drink, becauſe [d] three chiefs of his army had endanger'd their lives in drawing it out, was equally a ſacrifice of Libation; but oil was generally made uſe of on this occaſion. Thus Jacob, deſirous of returning thanks to God for the myſterious dream, in which he had ſeen a ladder and angels aſcending and deſcending thereon; and looking upon the place where God had been ſo merciful to him, as truly holy, and as the houſe of the Lord, [e] He poured oil upon the ſtone which he had us'd as a pillow during that dream.

From this action of Jacob we may obſerve by the way, that in his time 'twas a cuſtom for ſuch travellers as were piouſly inclin'd, to provide themſelves, before they ſet out upon a journey, with thoſe things which might enable them to praiſe and honour the Lord in a due manner, during the time they might ſpend in it; and that the ſacrifice of Libation being the moſt eaſily perform'd, as requiring the leaſt ceremony, they were always careful to carry a certain quantity of oil along with them, in order to pour it out before the Lord, and to offer it to him, either as an acknowledgment of his almighty power, to thank him for ſome bleſſing, or to implore one at his hands.

The ſacrifices of Libation among the heathens were perform'd with ſeveral other ſorts of liquors. As for inſtance, they offer'd milk to Rumina, the Goddeſs whom they invok'd for children that ſuck'd at the breaſt. The Athenians never offer'd wine to the ſun, to the moon, to Aurora, to Urania, the muſe who, according to them, invented aſtrology; nor to Mnemoſyne, on whom Jupiter had begotten the nine muſes, nor to any of the nymphs; to theſe the oblation was honey diluted with water.

Some pretend that the firſt Libations were made with wine, and that the etymology of the word Libation comes from the God Bacchus, who was alſo call'd [a] Liber.

Theſe kinds of ſacrifices which at firſt were inſtituted only in honour of the Gods, ſoon had a place in their feaſts and carouſals. [b] They there made profane Libations, and wine was pour'd in a ceremonious manner, which probably was always in honour of Bacchus.

The doctrine of the tranſmigration of ſouls which prevails among the Indians, prevents their offering any bloody ſacrifices to their Gods; and even, according to their theology, ſome of theſe Gods have liv'd under the form of ſuch animals as were fitteſt for ſacrifice; ſo that they offer only the fruits of the earth and incenſe to their idols.

They alſo pour oil before them, but not ſatisfy'd with this, they ſmear 'em over with it every time they make any oblations to it; ſo that they are generally black, ſooty, and all over clammy with oil. Arnobius tells us the ſame of the idols in his time. [c] I uſed to flatter, ſays he, a ſtone that was ſmear'd all over with oil, as tho' it had contain'd ſome mighty power.

If we except ſacrifices, we ſhall find that the Indians agree in ſeveral particulars with the Jews and antient heathens in their manner of honouring their Divinities, and praying to them in Pagods. They have drums, trumpets and chorus's, who ſing hymns in their honour. They ſometimes carry their idols in proceſſion thro' all the ſtreets of their cities; and have always, in theſe public ceremonies, women who ſing and dance before them to the ſound of the inſtruments of the country, as [d] David formerly play'd on his harp before the ark.

Theſe female dancers among the Indians are always proſtitutes, and tho' they generally dance in their Pagods, and before their Gods, they yet are not chaſter, nor is their reputation leſs unſullied upon that account.

We find that ſuch as were employ'd in the ſame ceremony among the Jews, were not had in greater eſteem; but had generally no better reſpect ſhewn them, than our common dancers meet with from us; for Michal told David, that he had acted the part of a buffoon when he ſtript himſelf in public [e].

As to David's uncovering himſelf to dance before the ark, for which Michal reproach'd him, we are to obſerve, that it was uſual for the Jews, in order to prevent their being encumbred in dancing, and to be more free and diſengag'd, to take off their cloaks, and keep on their under-garments only, which made 'em lighter, and conſequently more fit for that exerciſe: however this was no way ſuitable to that gravity which the Jews, and all the Eaſterns, ſo much boaſt of to this day.

The Indian women-dancers do the ſame; theſe, whenever they are going to that exerciſe, throw off a kind of large veil which covers their heads, and have nothing on but a petticoat, and a ſmall kind of linnen waiſt-coat.

Such Indians as embrace the chriſtian religion uſe likewiſe ſmall trumpets, a kind of hautboys, and drums, in their churches, and ſing ſpiritual ſongs to the ſound of theſe inſtruments; at leaſt this is obſerv'd in Pondicheri.

VI. Of the Places where they paid their Devotions to the Deity; and the Manner in which they build their Temples.

MEN have always made choice of [a] gloomy places, and ſhades made by loſty trees, to pay their devotions to the Deity. When the Jews put an oak into the ſanctuary, under which [b] Joſhua plac'd the ſtone on which the promiſe they made of never abandoning the worſhip of the true God, was engrav'd, 'twas purely in imitation of other nations. Nevertheleſs this was againſt the expreſs commandment of God, who had forbid the [c] planting of any wood or tree near his altar. But notwithſtanding this prohibition, they yet kept up this cuſtom, and worſhipp'd falſe gods in groves, for which they are reproach'd in [d] ſcripture. When Hoſea cenſures them for this crime, he ſays, that they ſought on this occaſion, for ſuch trees as projected the greateſt ſhade [e].

Before God had commanded Solomon to build a temple to him, it was uſual for pious people to ſacrifice to the true God upon hills, and even under the ſhadow of high trees; as Gideon did under the oak, where the angel touching the ſacrifice of this famous Jew with his wand, drew down fire from heaven upon it.

One would be apt to conclude, that in thoſe ages, men were allow'd to ſacrifice in any place whatſoever. Nevertheleſs we muſt except thoſe ſpots which were cover'd with trees, and in general, whatever might bear any affinity with the ſacred groves of the heathens, agreeable to that prohibition verſe 21ſt of the 16th chapter of Deuteronomy, by which every one was forbid to plant any tree near the altar of the true God, as was juſt now obſerv'd; further, we may ground this conjecture on the example of ſome Jews, who, at the ſame time that they adher'd ſtrictly to the rules of the Jewiſh doctrine, did nevertheleſs offer, as was ſaid before, ſacrifices in all places whatſoever. However, I believe, they did not ſtrictly obſerve the precepts of the Jewiſh religion in that particular, ſince it expreſsly enjoin'd the contrary: ſo that it would be impoſſible to make an apology for them, but by ſaying, that the cuſtom of ſacrificing to God in all places, tho' in direct oppoſition to the law, became as it were lawful, by the great number of thoſe who practis'd it; but it was far from being ſo in itſelf, ſince a diſpute broke out upon that account, even in Joſhua's time [f]. All the Iſraelites were offended to ſee the tribes of Reuben, of Gad, and the half tribe of Manaſſeh, raiſe a monument of their piety on the banks of Jordan, where Moſes had fix'd their habitation. The reſt of the Jews took this monument for an altar; and the warmeſt among them were of opinion, that they ought to go ſword in hand, and ravage all the lands of their brethren, to puniſh the crime they had been guilty of; but the more prudent thought it would be better to ſend deputies to them, to enquire the reaſon of their erecting an altar, in oppoſition to the expreſs prohibition of the law. The laſt opinion prevail'd, ſo that people were ſent to enquire into the motives of that action; all the excuſe they made to their brethren, was, that they did not thereby intend to erect an altar, but only a monument, as a memorial to their deſcendants of their being real Jews, and conſequently obedient to the laws of God which had been left them by Moſes.

After they had built the temple of Jeruſalem, they were then more expreſsly forbid to ſacrifice victims in any other place. Moſes himſelf warn'd them againſt it in the deſart; and gave them rules for their conduct, after God ſhould put them in poſſeſſion of the land of Promiſe. [a] Take heed, ſays he to them, that thou offer not thy burnt-offerings in every place that thou ſeeſt, but in the place which the Lord ſhall chuſe in one of thy tribes, there thou ſhalt offer thy burnt-offerings.

Some Jews however ſtill preſerv'd the antient cuſtom of offering ſacrifices to God on mountains or under trees. Thus where mention is made of ſome kings of Judah, as Jehoſhaphat and ſeveral others, who did not take away the high-places [b] where worſhip was offer'd up; we are not always to ſuppoſe that theſe were altars erected in honour of the falſe gods, for they were often raiſed to the true One, according to that paſſage in the Chronicles [c], Nevertheleſs the people did ſacrifice ſtill in the high-places, yet unto the Lord their God only. In fine, the ſacrificing in any place whatſoever was criminal only, upon this account, becauſe God had forbid them to ſacrifice any where but in Jeruſalem.

[d] The Indians have a great number of idols diſpers'd up and down the fields, and theſe are generally lodg'd in little tufted woods, or at the foot of ſome very ſhady tree. 'Tis here that travellers ſend up their prayers, and the devout their offerings, to beſeech their Gods to indulge them a proſperous voyage.

The Jews alſo erected altars in the fields for the ſervice of travellers, where they uſed to ſacrifice victims to God; but this was forbid after the temple of Jeruſalem was built, and we may affirm that one of the fineſt incidents in Aſa's life, is his demoliſhing thoſe altars [e].

The heathen Indians love, to this day, to have their Pagods, or temples, dark and gloomy. They obſerve not to let the light enter in but by the door, which is generally very low and narrow, except thro' ſome little loovers, which ſerve as windows. However in ſome Pagods the light comes in only at the door.

'Twas thus that the patriarch Abraham ſought for obſcurity, when he went and addreſs'd himſelf in prayer to God. The ſcripture takes notice that he planted a wood at Beer-ſheba, there [f] to call upon the name of the Lord the everlaſting God. The Jews had afterwards much the ſame idea of the divine Being, and thought he delighted in gloomy places, in thick clouds, and generally in darkneſs. Thus when Solomon caus'd the ark of the covenant to be carried into the temple which he had built, and ſaw it fill'd with ſo thick a cloud that the prieſts could not ſee to perform divine ſervice, he cry'd out, [g] That the Lord ſaid that he would dwell in the thick darkneſs. David enumerating in the ſeventeenth Pſalm the ſeveral things which attend on the divine Majeſty, ſays, That he made darkneſs his ſecret place; [h] his pavilion round about him were dark waters, and thick clouds of the skies. In fine, moſt nations of antiquity had the ſame opinion on that head; which poſſibly might have been founded on the tradition tradition they received from the inhabitants of the infant world, viz. that God inhabited the terreſtrial paradiſe, a place fill'd with trees, and conſequently [a] gloomy.

[d] 'Tis obſerv'd, that in thoſe countries where the Romiſh religion prevails, there are ſtill ſome cuſtoms among them, which bear a great affinity to thoſe of the Indians and antient Jews. For 'tis very common to meet with croſſes, images of the virgin, and little crucifixes in a kind of chapels built on eminencies; and alſo a great number of devout people who, with their beads in their hands, ſay their prayers, and mumble over a certain number of Paters and Ave-Marias. We often meet with fine fruit at the feet of theſe images of the Virgin, which is offer'd 'em from a religious principle.

Were we to enquire into the phyſical cauſe of the care which moſt nations have taken, to chuſe gloomy places for worſhipping the deity, I believe the following reaſons might be given, viz. that darkneſs and gloom ſuit naturally to that recollection and modeſty, which ought always to be obſerv'd in temples, in preſence of the ſupreme Being: for of all the ſenſes, the ſight is moſt apt to diſtract the mind, but darkneſs prevents our eyes from receiving the impreſſion of any object which might be capable of drawing off our attention; ſo that it ſuits perfectly all ſuch places as are appointed for prayer and devotion.

Moreover, darkneſs and gloom raiſe involuntarily in the mind, a kind of awe and terror which is very near a-kin to that veneration we owe to the Divinity; and it is, I believe, for this reaſon that the Romans call'd God by a name, which properly ſignifies fear or horror: for the Latin word [b] Deus, is manifeſtly borrow'd from the Greek Deos, formido; whence the Greeks may alſo have borrow'd their Teos: tho' ſome derive its etymology from Théein, [c] currere; becauſe ſeveral had formerly a notion that the ſtars, which run, as it were, perpetually, are ſo many Deities.

VII. Of the Temples dedicated to Priapus.

THE Indians have temples dedicated to Priapus, tho' under different names; and it may be affirm'd that they have very much improv'd the infamous poſtures in which the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans had repreſented him: ſeveral even wear a little Priapus about their necks, but cover'd with a little ſilver; and aſſert that it endues them with ſtrength and fruitfulneſs.

'Tis well known that ſome Jews formerly worſhip'd this abominable idol. The ſcripture tells us, that Aſa baniſh'd his mother Maachah from court, becauſe ſhe had erected an altar to [d] Priapus; this he cauſed to be broke [e] down, and had it burnt at the brook Kedron.

'Tis very probable that the Jews had learnt from the Egyptians to pay divine honours to Priapus, and erected ſtatues in his honour; for poſſibly this pretended deity had greater veneration paid him in Egypt, than in any other place. He was there conſider'd as the principle of mankind, which is the moſt noble thing in the world. There were few publick edifices, but had the true figures which were moſt ſuitable to that deity, placed over them; and theſe were conſider'd as the hieroglyphics or ſymbols of the greateſt and moſt perfect things that could be wiſh'd for in nature: ſuch as preferment, abundance, fruitfulneſs, union, ſtrength, vigour, and health.

In like manner the Romans uſed to invoke Priapus not only for propagation, but alſo for to make the earth fruitful. Every one had generally a ſtatue of Priapus in his garden, which at worſt ſerv'd for a ſcare-crow, and was at leaſt of ſervice in frighting away the birds, in caſe it could not contribute to fulfil their wiſhes, and procure them a plentiful [f] harveſt.

VIII. The Penates, or Houſhold-Gods of the Indians, and the Origin of the Tutelary Divinities.

BEſides the gods above-mention'd which the Indians have in their temples, they alſo have thoſe to which the antients gave the names of Lares, Manes, and Penates; theſe are little figures ſet by them in different parts of their houſes, which they rub over very careſully with oil, and ſurround with flowers, and imagine they ſhall obtain their favour by this means. Some have ſaid, that the Manes were infernal deities, which they diſtinguiſh'd from the Penates and Lares; but moſt authors uſe any of theſe three words indifferently to ſignify the ſouls departed; ſo that I ſhall not enquire into the difference which thoſe of a contrary opinion pretend to find between them.

Theſe tutelary divinities are of great antiquity. They had been introduced long before the Grecks, who probably might have borrow'd 'em, as well as the firſt foundations of their fabulous hiſtory, from thoſe who began to form the empire of the Aſſyrians. Herein I agree with thoſe who ſuppoſe this monarchy to have had its riſe in the city of Niniveh, and that it laſted thirteen hundred years: for were we to follow the opinion of Herodotus, and ſuppoſe that it exiſted only five hundred and twenty years, we then ſhould fix its beginning at the time when Deborah judg'd the Iſraelites; by which means the Aſſyrians would be poſterior to the Greeks, and conſequently the Greeks could not have borrow'd their fabulous hiſtory from them: for the moſt antient Grecian king that we read of in hiſtory is Inachus, king of Argos, who, according to the computation of the Septuagint, was contemporary with Moſes; tho' [a] Euſebius would make that great legiſlator cotemporary with Cecrops, who liv'd above three hundred years after, and laid the foundation of the twelve towns which form'd the little kingdom of Athens; and that thoſe who are of this opinion, make Inachus and Abraham cotemporaries, which has begun to create ſome confuſion in antient chronology.

But to return. We meet with the Penates long before Moſes's time, and conſequently before the Greeks. 'Tis probable that Laban's [b] Teraphins, which Rachel his daughter, who was afterwards Jacob's wife, had ſtole from her father, and hid in the camel's furniture, when he went into Rachel's tent to look for 'em, were tutelary Gods and Penates; whence we may conclude they were not large ſtatues. Laban in ſo doing had done no more than follow a cuſtom, which was practiſed long before his time; for Terah, Abraham's father, alſo made ſtatues among the Chaldeans, which could be no other than public idols, or tutelary divinities.

Theſe idols were not apply'd to any ill uſe in the beginning; for they were at firſt but ſo many figures by which men repreſented their deceaſed fathers, or ſuch of their ſoſovereigns as they had not an opportunity of honouring in perſon, by their living at a great diſtance from them. In this manner they endeavour'd to compenſate by art for what nature had taken from them, or which the diſtance of place prevented their having a ſight of. 'Twas therefore no more than a teſtimony of the love and reſpect which good children owe to their parents, or that ſubmiſſion and homage which loyal ſubjects pay to thoſe whom heaven has ſet over them.

The fourteenth book of Wiſdom furniſhes us with one of thoſe incidents which might have given riſe to that ſuperſtitious cuſtom with regard to ſuch ſtatues as were made in honour of deceaſed parents. The wiſe-man aſcribes it to the love which a ſon has for his father. So far would have been well; had the ſon kept his grief within due bounds, and not carried it to that exceſs as to worſhip as a god in the midſt of his family, him, whoſe loſs he ought to have regretted as a man only.

[a] Plato gives the name of Omogeneioi Theoi to the Penates: 'tis certain that when the antients mention'd theſe gods as their kindred, they meant no more than their deceaſed relations, who in the infancy of the world were had in great veneration by their poſterity; or in general ſuch of their family as had been dear to them in their life-time.

We may ſuppoſe that at firſt mankind only teſtified a great reſpect and veneration for theſe ſtatues, and that they conſider'd them merely as we in theſe days ſhould the picture of a deceaſed father who had been dear to us: however they exceeded by inſenſible degrees the bounds of ſuch a tenderneſs as is juſt and lawful, and fell into idolatry. But we may very probably ſuppoſe that the notion they had in thoſe remote ages of the immortality of the ſoul, was the firſt and chief ſource of idolatry.

Thoſe who were afterwards inform'd that their anceſtors had invoked the chief men of their family, and affirm'd that they had liſten'd to their prayers, were ſoon perſuaded, it was fitting they ſhould imitate ſo uſeful and glorious a worſhip. The virtues of theſe firſt chiefs were often the ſubject of their diſcourſe, and were by that means tranſmitted to poſterity. They had their ſtatues continually before their eyes, and preſerv'd them with care. 'Tis very probable that idolatry might thus have taken deep root in the minds of their poſterity, and poſſibly grew to a very great height from the idea which mankind have generally entertain'd with regard to preceding ages. They fancy that every thing in thoſe times was great and virtuous, and that their predeceſſors were free from thoſe frailties and imperfections which they ſo willingly point out in their contemporaries.

The tutelary divinities were lodg'd in different parts of the houſe, but were generally ſet in little niches made near the [b] hearth, that being the place where the whole family moſt frequently met together. As the Indians have no chimneys in their houſes, they lodge their Penates in any part of it.

IX. Of the Holy-Water of the Indians

THE Jews had their holy-water, with which they uſed to ſprinkle unclean perſons, the third day after their having been declared ſuch, and the ſeventh on which they were purified.

This was no more than clear water mix'd with the aſhes of a red cow, which was burnt out of the camp with its entrails. The prieſt, while they were burning it, always threw into the fire, cedar-wood, hyſſop, and a little ſcarlet.

[a] Plato de legibus. The proper ſignification of this is, thoſe gods who are of the ſame family; for Omogeneia ſignifies relation or kindred.

[b] This was the reaſon of their ſometimes uſing the word Eſtea, Focus, to ſignify the Penates or houſhold gods; and vice verſa, the word Penates to ſignify the hearth, or even the whole houſe.

The heathen Indians have alſo their holy-water, which is no more than cow's piſs; but as they think it would be a capital crime to burn the beaſt, they therefore uſe only its urine, and with this their devotees ſprinkle the ground before their doors every morning. They are of opinion, that this luſtration will drive away every kind of evil from their houſes, and alſo draw down the peculiar protection of the gods upon themſelves; they looking upon every thing which comes from that beaſt as holy and divine.

The great veneration they pay to cows, is, in my opinion, owing to ſome other reaſon than the pretended metempſycoſes of Phoe, or what they relate of Parmeſer. They tell us, that when the latter liv'd upon earth, he willingly undertook to look after 'em. But farther, they pretend to juſtify the affection they have for thoſe animals, by affirming that they are the beſt and moſt perfect of all beaſts; ſo that thoſe people revered cows independant from the honour which accrued to them by their receiving Phoe's ſoul, or their having been the care of one of their gods. It were eaſy to prove, that the Indians were not the only people who look'd upon the bull, the ox, and the cow, as deities. The Egyptians worſhip'd the ox under the names of Apis and Serapis, which ſignify the ſame thing. Some have pretended that Apis was nothing more than an hieroglyphic of Joſeph, who procured the Egyptians a happy abundance at the time of a great dearth. The ox indeed was conſider'd as an emblem of fruitfulneſs and abundance by theſe and all other heathen nations. Others relate, that Apis reign'd firſt in Argos, and afterwards in Egypt; that he taught the Egyptians to dreſs the vine; and that theſe out of gratitude for this favour, worſhip'd him after his death under the figure of an ox. We are told that this king aſſum'd the name of Oſiris in that place, which if true, Apis, Serapis, and Oſiris muſt conſequently ſignify the ſame thing.

Voſſius aſſerts, that there were three Oſiris's in Egypt, and that Ham, or his ſon Mizraim, was the firſt. The word [a] Mizraim has indeed continued in Egypt, and it is thus call'd in the Hebrew text. The ſecond, according to that author, is Joſeph, and the third Moſes; but there is hardly room to ſuppoſe his conjecture probable with regard to the laſt. Be that as it will, 'tis certain that the Egyptians worſhip'd an ox under the names of Apis, Serapis, and Oſiris; and this animal was probably look'd upon as the hieroglyphic of one of thoſe [b] whom we juſt now mention'd.

The Jews, in imitation of the Egyptians, made a golden calf in the deſart, and fell down and worſhip'd it. In the diviſion of the kingdoms of Judah and Iſrael, Jeroboam erected two, the one at Dan, and the other at Bethel, and theſe the Iſraelites worſhip'd as gods, who had brought them out of the land of Egypt. Jupiter was ador'd under the figure of a bull, which ſhape the poets tell us he borrow'd, in order to carry off Europa. This fiction is of great antiquity, ſince [b] Anacreon mentions it in one of his odes. In fine, ſeveral antient nations paid divine worſhip to the ox, or at leaſt honour'd that beaſt as the emblem of fruitfulneſs and abundance.

[d] Diodorus Siculus relates, that the Troglodytes uſed to ſtrangle with an ox tail, all ſuch old men as were paſt their labour, or were no longer able to look after their flocks; and in general all weak and feeble people, and thoſe who were troubled with any incurable diſeaſe: nay, farther, they imagin'd they did 'em a great piece of ſervice in not ſuffering 'em to continue long in a languiſhing condition, and diſpatching 'em quickly

[a] The Arabians call it Mezr to this day. See Vanſleb's relation of Egypt.

[b] The body of this ox was to be black, that part of the head which is over the eyes, white, and a white ſpot on its back. This quadruped deity had a peculiar way of pronouncing his oracles, which at the ſame time was very ſimple, as well as conformable to the dictates of nature. The perſon who conſulted the beaſt, ſet ſomething to eat before him, which if he refuſed, 'twas a bad omen, and he was to expect nothing but ill luck; but in caſe he accepted what was offer'd him, they were poſitive that every thing would be propitious.

quickly into the other world. Not to mention that they thought they did 'em a ſingular honour, when they ſtrangled 'em with the tail of ſo noble a beaſt as the ox or cow.

The Indians indeed don't carry their charity to ſo great a length; however they think it a great honour, and fancy themſelves ſure of eternal happineſs, whenever they expire with a cow-tail in their hands.

The Egyptians worſhipp'd an ox under the name of Apis, and Serapis, as has been already obſerv'd; hence we may conclude, that they never kill'd that beaſt, eſpecially ſince when Pharaoh commanded the children of Iſrael to offer ſacrifices to their God and not leave Egypt, Moſes reply'd, that that could not be done, ſince [a] the Egyptians would ſtone them, were they to ſee them ſacrifice any beaſt they worſhipp'd. If therefore the Egyptians could not behold without horror, the Jews ſacrificing thoſe beaſts which were the object of their worſhip, we may conclude from thence, that they themſelves never kill'd them. Moreover Juvenal relates, that the Egyptians abſtain'd from eating all [b] woolly beaſts, and that this people thought it a crime to kill a kid.

In caſe the Egyptians were not allow'd to kill ſheep or kids, we may naturally ſuppoſe they did not kill oxen, a beaſt they had in ſo great veneration; however [c] they allow'd the Jews to kill and eat them. Plutarch relates, that they themſelves uſed to ſacrifice red oxen in honour of Typhon. The Iſraelites eat lambs in that country, notwithſtanding that Juvenal affirms the Egyptians never fed upon any woolly animals, whence we may conclude, that they did not oblige the Jews to adhere ſtrictly to all their cuſtoms in particular, but were ſatisfy'd, provided they did not do any thing in public, which claſh'd with their religion and ceremonies.

Poſſibly the almoſt univerſal veneration which idolaters had for the ox, might have been wholly owing to the great ſervice they afford to man. As for inſtance, great numbers of people, even after the deluge, ſubſiſted chiefly on milk and the fruits of the earth: ſo that the cow furniſh'd them their principal diet. The ox was employ'd in ploughing the ground, in carrying the baggage of travellers, and in drawing of chariots. In deſarts, where no wood was to be found, men uſed to make firing of its dung mix'd with a little ſtraw, which was afterwards dry'd in the ſun, and this is the practice of the Indians to this day, in all thoſe places where there is a ſcarcity of wood.

Mankind accuſtom'd themſelves therefore inſenſibly to take very great care of a beaſt, to whom they were ſo much indebted, and who was even in ſome meaſure neceſſary to them. By degrees he was rank'd above all other animals, as he juſtly deſerv'd to be; but this care and gratitude at laſt became veneration, and this latter ſoon after degenerated into adoration: ſo true is it that mankind are ſeldom ſatisfy'd with a medium, and generally run into extremes.

[d] The Indians likewiſe ſet on a pillar a little cow of wood or ſtone, in a great many places. I enquir'd, tho' to no purpoſe, whether they look'd upon theſe images as idols or Menſa, nefas illic fœtum jugulare capellæ.

[c] This reaſon would almoſt perſuade us, that the Egyptians did not really worſhip an ox, or at moſt that they paid him a ſymbolical worſhip only. 'Tis alſo probable, that the ox Apis, was not a god till after his conſecration, which is pretty manifeſt from antient hiſtory. Beſides, 'twas impoſſible for every ox to be a god, ſince it was neceſſary for them to have certain marks before they could be entitled to that honour.

[d] On the frontiers of Bengal is an ox of a prodigious ſize, which ſtands in the high-road, and has two carbuncles or rubies for its eyes. The Indians of that country ſeldom ſet out upon a journey without firſt invoking that animal. Thoſe of the kingdom of Var anoint or daub their houſes over with the fat of a new-ſlain ox. Thoſe of Meliapur carry ſome bull's-hair along with them, and tye it to the necks of their horſes, thinking it to be an excellent preſervative. Others, who alſo worſhip oxen, firſt kill them, then break their bones to pieces, and therewith make a kind of ointment to rub themſelves withal, as Marcus Paulus aſſures us.

or Taliſmans. I had obſerv'd ſomething of this nature before I went into India, for I ſaw in the iſle of Mocli, inhabited by Mahometans who are an Arabian colony, the bones of an ox's head fill'd with Arabic characters, which were almoſt effac'd; and I was perſuaded that they look upon that head as a Taliſman, and imagine they owe to it the preſervation and fruitfulneſs of their cattle; for the Arabians give very much into theſe kind of myſteries.

Neither were the Jews wholly free from the ſuperſtition with regard to Taliſmans, nor ſhall we be too bold in our aſſertions, if we affirm that they honoured the brazen ſerpent which Moſes had rais'd in the wilderneſs as a Taliſman; for incenſe was ſeldom offer'd up in their honour; they being often laid in the foundations of ſuch edifices or cities as were put under their protection; or elſe were ſet upon towers and [a] pyramids. Nevertheleſs ſome of theſe were lodg'd in little private temples, and were kept from public view. The ſcriptures relate, that the Jews offer'd incenſe to the brazen ſerpent till [b] Hezekiah's time, who caus'd it to be broke to pieces. The Palladium of the Trojans was alſo a Taliſman, and there were few cities but had antiently ſomething peculiar to it, [c] on which they imagin'd its fate depended.

X. Of the River Ganges, and the Countries which it waters.

THE antients have ſpoken of the river Ganges. St. Jerom when he writes to Ruſticus the monk, agrees with the ſcriptures when he ſays, that the Ganges or Piſon, by which name 'tis call'd by Moſes in the book of Geneſis, compaſſeth the whole land of Havilah; he obſerves that the emerald and the carbuncle grow in that country; that it abounds with mountains of gold, which it is impoſſible to come near becauſe of the great number of griffins, dragons, and other [d] monſters.

When the ſcripture mentions Ganges, or, if you will, Piſon, in my opinion it deſcribes that river as it was before the flood, and immediately after the creation of the world; ſince it makes it flow from the ſame ſource as the other three: but 'tis very probable that the waters which overſpread the face of the whole earth quite chang'd the courſe of the ſeveral rivers; and conſequently that thoſe rivers which are now call'd Tigris, Ganges, and Euphrates, are not thoſe antient rivers which iſſued out of the terreſtrial paradiſe, and that they have nothing of them but the name.

I believe we may alſo preſume, without running any risk of claſhing with ſcripture, to ſubſtract ſome things from the deſcription which St. Jerom has given us of the Ganges, of the emeralds, the carbuncles, and the mountains of gold; the country which that river waters,

[a] As the author has mention'd the pyramids of Egypt in this place, it may not be improper to obſerve, that there is ſome conformity between the Egyptians and Chineze on this head. The latter have towers in the ſhape of pyramids, at the top of which they ſet an idol. They have a great veneration both for the tower and the idol. Now, whether they look upon it as a Taliſman, or that the tower conceals ſome other ſuperſtitious thing, capable of exciting the devotion of the Chineze, 'tis certain that there is ſome reſemblance between theſe towers and pyramids. The Egyptians had them alſo in great veneration, and we are aſſur'd, that they worſhip'd the point or top of thoſe edifices.

[b] 4 Reg. xviii. 4. Confregitque ſerpentem æneum quem fecerat Moyſes, ſiquidem uſque ad illud tempus filii Iſrael adolebant ei incenſum.

[c] Cities and States were under the protection of ſome Gods, or certain particular things, which were look'd upon as ſacred. This was probably in imitation of the Jewiſh religion, that had its ark, its urim, &c. all which the heathens ſeem likewiſe to have imitated on certain occaſions. 'Tis alſo poſſible that the heathens might have invented thoſe ſuperſtitions without having borrow'd them from the Jews.

[d] S. Hieronymus Ruſtico Epiſtol. 13.——Ad Indiam pervenitur & ad Gangem fluvium, quem Phiſon ſacra ſcriptura commemorat, qui circuit totam terram Evilath——ubi naſcitur carbunculus & ſmaragdus——monteſque auri, quos adire propter gryphos & dracones, & immenſorum corporum monſtra hominibus impoſſibile eſt. Theſe golden mountains would be of admirable uſe in adorning the ſurface of Fairy-land. Man may eaſily form the moſt extravagant and groteſque ideas of thoſe things which are at a great diſtance from him, or with which he is altogether unacquainted.

waters, being rich only by the fruitfulneſs of its ſoil, by its ſilks and muſlins, which draw a great number of foreigners to it, and almoſt all the gold of the Indies, a conſiderable part of which comes from Achim in the iſland of Sumatra, diſtant upwards of three hundred leagues from the Ganges.

'Tis thought that the city of Achim is the ſame with Ophir mention'd inſcripture, whence Solomon is ſaid to have ſent for gold; which conjecture is not altogether improbable: for the fleet of this mighty king was built at [a] Ezion-geber, a city of Idumea or Edom, ſituated on the ſhore of the Red-Sea. 'Tis very probable, that this city was not far diſtant from the place where Moca now ſtands; nor does it appear that the ſhips which came out of the Red-Sea, could have gone any where for ſo great a quantity of gold as in the iſle of Sumatra, which is nevertheleſs at a great diſtance from it; whence 'tis manifeſt that the voyages to that place muſt in thoſe days have taken up a conſiderable time, and been perform'd with great difficulty, as they had not the uſe of the ſea-compaſs, and conſequently could not advance far into the ocean, but on the contrary were generally forc'd to coaſt it. 'Tis probable that this voyage is hinted at in [b] Eccleſiaſticus, where the fame of Solomon is ſaid to have reach'd to the moſt diſtant iſles.

Monſ. Huet ſpeaking of the canal that join'd the Mediterranean to the Red-Sea, by which the ſhips of Solomon and Hiram might have return'd laden into Judea or Phœnicia, thinks that Ophir was the eaſtern coaſt of Africa call'd Zanguebar; but this country is not near ſo fruitful in gold as Achim. Beſides, if it be objected, that Sumatra lay at too great a diſtance for men who were not very well skill'd in navigation, this will make much ſtronger againſt Zanguebar. The learned prelate above-mention'd, makes them undertake a longer and more dangerous voyage, when he brings them back from Spain into the Red-Sea, and conſequently were oblig'd to ſail quite round Afric. He then ſpeaks of thoſe who return'd back from Tarſus.

We neither meet with dragons, or griffins on the banks of the Ganges: but as for crocodiles, rhinoceros's and tygers, they are pretty numerous in thoſe parts, the laſt of which make dreadful havock. Some of theſe have taken children out of the very houſes; and was a man to go but a little way into the woods, he would run the hazard of being devour'd by them. I myſelf ſaw, in a party of hunting on the banks of the Ganges, the freſh print of the feet of thoſe beaſts, which, without exaggerating, were above ſeven inches over.

There are alſo a prodigious number of crocodiles. Theſe generally live in the water, and even haunt the little rivulets which run into the Ganges, becauſe they there meet with a greater quantity of food than in the main river; but when they come out of the water, they ſeldom go far from ſhore. The moſt ſurprizing accounts have been told me of the prodigious ſtrength of theſe animals, and I have been frequently aſſur'd by the inhabitants of the country, that they would often ſeize an ox by the muzzle, when it was going to drink, and draw it to the bottom of the river without any manner of difficulty; and indeed 'tis very dangerous to waſh in it.

[c] The Indians have alſo a peculiar veneration for the Ganges, and look upon it as a God, and therefore daily offer ſacrifices to it; for which purpoſe, they ſet little lamps on its banks, and theſe being carried away by the ſtream, look very pretty in the night.

Several who inhabit near the Ganges, when they find themſelves very ill, beg to be carried on the banks of it, there to reſign their breath; for they think that all thoſe are happy who die on its waters; and fancy, that it has the virtue of waſhing away their ſins [d].

When

[a] 3 Reg. cap. 9. [b] Eccleſ. xlvii. 17. Ad inſulas longè divulgatum eſt nomen tuum.

[c] The Egyptians had alſo a great veneration for the Nile, and even deify'd it; for Oſiris, whom we have already mention'd, was the Nile, or at leaſt ſignify'd the virtue of that river, which is well known to have made the land of Egypt fruitful.

[d] O faciles nimium qui triſtia crimina cædis,
Flumine a tolli poſſe putatis aqua.

When once a ſick perſon has deſired to be carry'd thither, he cannot recede from it. Being come there, they firſt put his feet into the river, and afterwards force him to ſwallow down a great quantity of water, which they exhort him to drink with devotion and a holy confidence, and to be firmly perſuaded that it will waſh his ſoul and wipe away all his ſins. In fine, they plunge him gently into the river, whence he muſt never hope to return alive. Several, whom an indiſcreet devotion, or ſome family diſcontent had prompted with a deſire of being carry'd to the Ganges, have been drown'd in it. They were very far from being ſo ill, as to be perſuaded they ſhould be ſo ſoon ſanctified by this means; and ſincerely repented, but too late, of the fault they had committed.

Such as live at a very great diſtance from the Ganges, are contented, whenever they can get ſome of that water, to drink a little before they die; and fancy that this is equally efficacious in cleanſing them from all their ſins. People who live at a great diſtance from it, often go thither, and get a little of its ſacred water, which they carry into their reſpective countries, to furniſh their chief Pagods therewith, which indeed are ſeldom unprovided of it. I myſelf once ſaw a ſmall caravan of devout Indians going through Pondicheri (three hundred leagues diſtance from the river at leaſt) who were carrying great pots or veſſels adorn'd with Rotain, fill'd with the water of the Ganges. Theſe poor wretches kept thoſe pots very careſully, and ſeem'd to have them in the higheſt veneration, tho' they were at a great diſtance from their homes.

I cannot forbear reflecting here, on the darkneſs which has overſpread the minds of thoſe idolaters, and obſerving, that truth and fiction make the ſame impreſſion on the minds and hearts of men. [a] Mankind are as prone to error, and adhere as zealouſly to the groſſeſt ſuperſtitions, as they ought to do to true religion. 'Tis really ſurprizing, that what we call the force of truth, does not make a greater impreſſion upon them; that its light does not ſtrike irreſiſtibly on the blind, and open their eyes ſo as to give them a ſight of their errors. But for this we muſt have recourſe to the depth of God's judgments, and to that abyſs of prudence which is impenetrable to human eyes, and is comprehended by God only.

But to return to the Ganges. 'Tis probable that the veneration which the Indians have for that river may be owing to the tradition they had receiv'd from their predeceſſors with regard to Piſon, mention'd in ſcripture; and that they inſenſibly mix'd the account they had receiv'd from mankind in the firſt ages, with the fabulous hiſtories of their chimerical Gods.

They not only have a great veneration for the river Ganges, which they conſider as the moſt holy river in the world, and even a God; but alſo pay the utmoſt reverence to all floods and rivers in [b] general. Their devotees, before they put their feet into any river, waſh their hands with a little of its water, and at the ſame time offer up a ſhort prayer to the Gods.

This cuſtom of reſpecting rivers, and waſhing one's hands in their waters, is ſtrongly recommended by [c] Heſiod, one of the moſt antient poets now extant.

This veneration might be owing to the opinion the antients entertain'd, of every flood and river's having its peculiar Deity, which was ſuppos'd to preſide over its water.

[a] The reaſons which are here given for this turn of mind have already been made by a great number of writers. See Bayle's Reflection on Comets.

XI. Of the Metempſycoſis, or Tranſmigration of Souls.

THE Indians believe the tranſmigration of ſouls; a manifeſt proof of which, is, the great number of hoſpitals erected in Surat, for the lodging, feeding, and healing of all ſuch beaſts as are either maimed, crippled, or afflicted with any diſeaſe. I have not been able to diſcover whence this doctrine took its riſe among them, and am of opinion, that this would be a very difficult point; for we meet with great numbers of people who profeſs the ſame religion, and worſhip God in the ſame temples; have the ſame ceremonies among them, and are likewiſe of the ſame tribe, who yet have very different notions on this head. As for inſtance, there are certain [a] Bramins who live only on [b] herbs, milk, butter and fruits, while others eat hens only, and others again the fleſh of the roe-buck. Some tribes eat ſwine's fleſh, but all in general abſtain from oxen and cows. I have already taken notice of the veneration they have for thoſe beaſts.

The Banians, who are a particular tribe of merchants, and of whom mention will be made in the ſequel, adhere more ſtrictly to the doctrine of the tranſmigration of ſouls than the reſt of the Indians, and obey, with the moſt religious exactneſs, the moſt inconſiderable injunctions of it. [c] They never kill any kind of animals, nor eat of any thing that had life; ſome of them are ſo ſcrupulouſly exact in this particular, as to keep ſervants purely to fan the air while they eat, in order to drive away the great number of gnats or little flies with which that country is infeſted; for fear leſt any of them ſhould unfortunately drop into the victuals, or that they ſhould ſwallow them down, and ſo kill them.

One might, methinks, conclude from this diverſity of opinions with regard to the tranſmigration of ſouls, that at the time of its being introduc'd among thoſe Indians, they had already an eſtabliſh'd form of worſhip and a religion independent from that doctrine; ſo that it was at firſt receiv'd no otherwiſe than as an opinion, which having no ill tendency in itſelf, might be either receiv'd or rejected, as every perſon ſhould judge proper. Some heads of families gave afterwards into this new philoſophy, and adher'd very ſcrupulouſly to all its principles. Others thinking it impoſſible for the ſouls of men to tranſmigrate into the bodies of certain animals, would therefore not abſtain from eating them. Every one afterwards acquainted his family with the notion he entertain'd on this head, and by this means tranſmitted it by inſenſible degrees to their poſterity; and theſe have always imbib'd it, and look upon it at this day as a law which they are indiſpenſably oblig'd to follow, and that becauſe they pay the utmoſt deference and veneration to all the cuſtoms of their anceſtors.

Had

[a] We find a great conformity between the Bramins and the antient Egyptian prieſts. As for inſtance, the former waſh themſelves with clear water twice a-day before they enter into their Pagods, which cuſtom was alſo obſerv'd by the antient Egyptians. They plunge themſelves into the Ganges out of a ſpirit of devotion, after which they take up water, and throw towards the ſun, as a teſtimony of their veneration. The Egyptians uſed alſo to plunge themſelves in the ſacred water of the Nile, and never eat of any thing that has life, as the Bramins at this day.

[b] Several eat neither milk, cheeſe, butter, eggs, nor any thing that is produc'd from living animals; for fear, ſay they, leſt they ſhould imprudently ſwallow down the ſouls of any of their heroes, relations, &c.

[c] Their charity to beaſts is ſo very ridiculous, that it would appear altogether improbable, did not ſeveral travellers aſſure us they themſelves had been eye-witneſſes to it, and among the reſt Mr. Fryar an Engliſh phyſician. The Banians, ſays he, in his excellent voyage into Perſia and the Indies, live under the ſame roof with oxen and cows, &c. and ſuffer themſelves to be eat up with vermin out of a charitable principle. Tho' they are tormented by gnats and mosketoes, they yet never dare hurt them. And how grievouſly ſoever theſe inſects ſting them, they yet imagine they bring the bleſſings of heaven along with them. At their deaths, they purchaſe liberty to ſome animals, and free them from all their labours, &c.

Had the doctrine of tranſmigration been at firſt eſtabliſh'd among the Indians as an article of religion, we then ſhould not have found ſo great a variety of opinions among them upon that head. They wou'd even have conſider'd all ſuch as ſchiſmatics who differ'd from the general opinion, and would not follow that doctrine in all its purity. They would at laſt have ſeparated entirely from one another, and have had different temples, prieſts, and even ſacrifices.

The reader may poſſibly ask, whether the Indians receiv'd the doctrine of tranſmigration from Pythagoras or his followers; for this philoſopher is generally ſuppos'd to have firſt ſtarted this opinion, or at leaſt to have firſt taught it.

Were we to anſwer this queſtion agreeably to the diſcoveries which have been made in our days in the empire of China, we then ſhould affirm that the Indians and Chineze had the doctrine of tranſmigration five hundred years at leaſt before that philoſopher, who, as [a] Tully informs us, liv'd when the Romans drove Tarquinius Superbus out of Rome, and changed their monarchy into a common-wealth. In Solomon's time, an Indian philoſopher, whoſe name was [b] Phoe, a native, as ſome have it, of the iſland of Ceylan, or according to others, of the neighbouring continent, publiſh'd this doctrine in the Indies.

This man, in order to give the greater weight and authority to this new philoſophy, and that it might be receiv'd with the greater awe and veneration, aſſur'd the people he had receiv'd it from heaven: he caus'd himſelf to be conſider'd as a prophet, and even went ſo far as to affirm, that he was the beſt man upon earth.

He taught a twofold doctrine, the one interior, the other exterior. He communicated the interior doctrine to ſuch of his deareſt diſciples only, whom he knew were entirely devoted to him, and on whoſe fidelity he was ſenſible he might ſafely rely. In this ſyſtem he aſſerted, that the ſoul would be annihilated after death, and that after its ſeparation from the body, it diſſolv'd itſelf in air, and form'd an ethereal ſubſtance; which differs but very little from that ſpecies of [c] atheiſm, which we are told all the learned Chineze have imbib'd.

With regard to the exterior doctrine, he taught the people the tranſmigration of ſouls, [d] and affirm'd that he himſelf had experienc'd it a numberleſs multitude of times; having liv'd on the earth under the figure of an ape, a calf, an elephant, and ſeveral other beaſts. 'Tis on theſe different kinds of beaſts, in whoſe bodies he ſaid his ſoul had paſs'd, that moſt of the religions of the Indians are grounded, who probably before that time had only the knowledge of ſome ſupreme Being, or in general of ſome Deity, to whom they might offer ſacrifices.

Nevertheleſs, I would not be underſtood to conclude from hence, that this knowledge which the Indians had of a ſovereign Being, was ſuitable to the divine Majeſty; or, in other words, that they acknowledg'd the true God only; that the ſacrifices which they made were addreſs'd to no other Being than to him, and that their religion was free from ſuperſtition and idolatry till Fo or Phoe.

'Twou'd be an odd paradox were we to advance that (at a time when a cloud of error had overſpread the world, and that God was oblig'd as it were to ſeparate Abraham from the reſt of mankind, in order to make him the father of a people who might adore and

[a] 4 Tuſcul. quæſt. in Brut.

[b] Fo or Xechia, a Chineze Deity, which firſt came from the Indies, where it bears the name of Ram; at Japan, that of Xaca; at Tunquin, that of Chiaga, &c. of whom mention will be made in the ſequel. All we ſhall now obſerve in this place, is, that ſome authors take this Xaca for Pythagoras, and others for Hermes Triſmegiſtus the Egyptian.

[c] This opinion is not any way atheiſtical. This diſſolving of the ſoul into an ethereal ſubſtance is a notion of great antiquity, which will admit of a pretty tollerable interpretation. 'Tis indeed true, that it ſuppoſes the ſoul to be a corporeal being.

[d] The Indians tell us that the ſoul of Xaca went thro' eighty teouſand metamorphoſes, and at laſt fix'd its habitation the body of a white elephant. Hence ariſes the veneration the Indians have for the white elephant.

and ſerve him without ſuperſtition, or dividing his worſhip between the true God and the falſe ones) to advance, I ſay, that truth ſhould have ſhelter'd herſelf among the Indians; that it there continued in all its purity till Solomon's time; and that the idea of one ſole God, unſully'd with error, was preſerv'd in India, at the ſame time that the Jews were continually falling into idolatry, and the Indians worſhip'd the ſupreme Being in a manner altogether ſuitable to his divine perfections.

Phoe propos'd his new doctrine to the Indians, and eaſily prevail'd with them to receive it, and heighten it with the wild chimæras, which they had entertain'd till his time, with regard to the Deity and the ſoul. 'Tis well known that mankind in general are vaſtly fond of novelty, and particularly the inferior ſort, eſpecially when they imagine that their religion will either have the greater ſpread, or receive any improvements by that means.

Moreover, the doctrine of tranſmigration made its way more eaſily into the minds of men, becauſe the notion prevail'd univerſally with regard to the immortality of the ſoul, which was thought to go into a certain place after its diſſolution from the body. This has in different ages, given riſe to ſeveral very whimſical opinions; for ſome fancy'd that the ſouls of the wicked went immediately after death into a place of torment, where they were puniſh'd according to the enormity of their crimes; an opinion that has been moſt generally receiv'd by all heathens. Others were ſo ridiculous as to aſſert, that the Gods caus'd ſouls to paſs into the bodies of the dirtieſt and moſt vile animals. Others thought, that they wander'd up and down the world, and that they were oblig'd to ramble in that manner for many ages, before they were allow'd to aſcend into heaven whence they ſprung. [a] Tully was probably of opinion, that ſouls roam up and down after this life, as appears from Scipio's [b] dream.

Phoe writ forty volumes, which continu'd untranſlated, and were wholly confin'd to the Indies, till anno Dom. 65. when the diſciples of that philoſopher carried it to China under the reign of Hoamti. The Chineze immediately tranſlated it into their language. They proved the age in which his followers ſaid he liv'd, from the ſeveral particulars ſcatter'd up and down in his works, all which bore ſome relation to ſeveral circumſtances with which they were acquainted, with regard to the Indians. No ſooner did this doctrine make its appearance among 'em, but it met with a numberleſs multitude of followers.

XII. The charitable Manner of the Indians giving Drink to Travellers.

OUR Saviour, to ſhew us in his goſpel, that every action we do for his ſake ſhall be rewarded, promiſes one to all thoſe, who in his name, and from a deſire of being acceptable to him, ſhall give even ſo much as a glaſs of water.

The reader poſſibly will ſay, that a glaſs of water is a mere trifle; however the giving even this, is a very meritorious action on certain occaſions, and in the manner as ſeveral Indians do it, for they ſometimes fetch it at a great diſtance, and boil it, in order to make it the more ſalutary. Theſe people wait all-day-long in thoſe roads where there are no wells nor rivulets to be met with, and offer water to all paſſengers in honour of their Gods.

'Tis

[a] Others imagin'd, that after their leaving the body they were to go through fire, in order to be purg'd from the uncleanneſs they had contracted in this life; which opinion prevails to this day.

[b] Qui, &c. Deorum & hominum, jura violarunt, corporibus elapſi, circa terram ipſam volutantur, nec in hunc locum, niſi multis exagitati ſæculis revertuntur.

'Tis probable that the Jews had formerly this pious cuſtom, as alſo their neighbour nations, whoſe cuſtoms they were acquainted with. Our Saviour alluded to this cuſtom, when he aſſur'd us that it would meet with its reward.

'Tis certain that the Eaſterns are much more charitable than the Europeans with reſpect to ſuch things as are neceſſary to the ſupport of life. They ſcarce ever refuſe victuals and drink to poor paſſengers, unleſs when their country is oppreſs'd with famine, in which they imitate the practice of mankind in the infancy of the world, who never uſed to ſuffer any traveller to paſs by, without offering him ſomething, or giving him ſome little refreſhment. Thus Abraham caus'd three angels to [a] reſt themſelves, and ſet victuals before them, when they, having aſſum'd the human figure, paſs'd thro' the valley of Mamre, where he then was, in order to get Lot out of Sodom. At their arrival in that city, Lot would not ſuffer them to ſtand without, but [b] carried them into his houſe, tho' he was an entire ſtranger to them. The ſtranger who dwelt at Gibeah offer'd, in like manner, his houſe to the [c] Levite, and was very much ſurpriz'd that all refus'd him admittance; for in thoſe days, every body kept open houſe, and uſed to entertain travellers with great chearfulneſs and pleaſure, without expecting the leaſt reward for it.

XIII. Their Manner of eating Locuſts.

WE read in the goſpels, that St. John the Baptiſt liv'd on locuſts and wild honey. Some interpreters, who could never believe that any human creature ever fed on thoſe inſects, ſay that by the word locuſta we are to underſtand the extremities of branches of trees, and affirm it to have been the only ſuſtenance this holy anchorite took; but they did not know that the Indians often [d] eat boil'd locuſts; and tho' they are like to thoſe in Europe, they yet never make any of them ſick.

Nor was this food very uncommon among the Jews, God allowing them to feed upon thoſe inſects; as we find it expreſs'd in Leviticus in manner following. [e] Yet theſe ye may eat of, every flying, creeping thing, that goeth upon all-four, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth——Even theſe of them ye may eat: the locuſt after his kind, and the bald-locuſt after his kind, and the beetle after his kind, and the graſhopper after his kind.

XIV. Of the fortified Places, into which the Shepherds withdraw with their Flocks.

THE ſcripture tells us, that [f] Uzziah built towers in the deſart, and digged many wells, becauſe of the great number of cattle he had in the plains.

In my opinion theſe towers are the ſame with thoſe the Indians call Pagods; not thoſe which they uſe as temples, but certain other large edifices which they build in plains,

[a] Geneſ. xviii. [b] Geneſ. xix. [c] Judg. xix.

[d] Theſe locuſts are generally large, red, and ſo weighty, that they cannot riſe from the ground when they are carried, at certain ſeaſons, by whirlwinds towards Ormuz and Banderabaſſi. The peaſants in thoſe countries dry, ſalt, and burn or parch them, and carry 'em to market like other proviſions.

[f] 2 Paral. xxvi. 10. Extruxit etiam turres in ſolitudine, & effodit ciſternas plurimas eò quod haberet multa pecora.

plains, and call Pagods, probably becauſe that over their gates pyramids are ſet which are adorn'd with figures of their gods, as Witznou and ſuch like; or elſe becauſe they have a great number of little chapels within them, each of which has an idol.

Theſe edifices are generally ſurrounded with ſtrong walls, and thither they carry their cattle in time of danger; for the people are oblig'd to ſtand always upon their guard, tho' their king ſhould be at peace with all his neighbours: becauſe, as in thoſe countries the ſoldiers are ill paid, their commanders, who keep their pay, allow them therefore to plunder at pleaſure; ſo that they often fall upon the cattle when they are leaſt expected. Theſe marauders often forc'd us to take up arms at Pondichery, and we even had the ill fortune to loſe a very brave officer in one of thoſe ſallies, and another was wounded, and alſo ſeveral of the natives who were in our ſervice. But 'twould be to no purpoſe to ſue for juſtice from their commander, or repreſent to him, that his ſoldiers have no right to make any inroads into other peoples territories, at a time when they are at peace with the Great Mogul their maſter: they always promiſe very fair, and as ſurely break it; they being oblig'd either to pay their ſoldiers, or give 'em leave to plunder. Such as are travelling in India retire into theſe Pagods: in Perſia they withdraw into [a] Caravan-ſerahs, and in Arabia into their Caravan-beites, or houſe of Caravans.

In all places where there are no Pagods there are uſually other little edifices, call'd Chaudries, which travellers may alſo retire to, but not with the ſame conveniency. There are in India ſeveral reſervoirs of water, pretty much like thoſe ciſterns or wells which the king of Judah cauſed to be ſunk in the deſart. Theſe heathens think that the digging of wells and ponds in ſolitary places, for the conveniency of travellers and beaſts, a charitable action; and it often happens, that a vow made to their Gods, a deſire of obtaining children, or of ſucceſs in ſome undertaking, are the motives of their making them.

XV. Of their public Edifices.

THE Pagods and other public edifices of the heathens are generally built of great black ſtones of an extraordinary length. The pillars, of which there are always a great number, are almoſt of one piece, and ſupport ſtone rafters that form the cieling. Theſe rafters are generally ſeventeen or eighteen foot long, and about three foot and an half broad. They are all fix'd to one another, and a little lime is put between the joints, to hinder the water from coming thro': ſo that there is not one ſingle piece of wood in theſe great buildings.

The ſcarcity of theſe ſtones, the difficulty of removing them from one place to another, and of fixing 'em in buildings, raiſes their value prodigiouſly. The walls of Jeruſalem were built of ſuch ſtones, whoſe great length and [b] thickneſs made them valuable.

[c] Solomon alſo employ'd ſuch ſtones in laying the foundations of his houſe, and that which he built for Pharaoh's daughter. 'Tis ſaid in the book of Kings, that the foundation was of coſtly ſtones, even of great ſtones, ſtones of ten cubits, and ſtones of eight cubits. This ſtrong way of building made them very durable, and enabled them

[a] Theſe Caravan-ſerahs are edifices rais'd by the charity of the Eaſterns. Some of theſe in Perſia are dedicated to certain Mahometan ſaints, as for inſtance, to Band-Aly, or Chaſte Aly. The Caravan-ſerahs have no kind of furniture in them. Travellers have ingreſs and egreſs without giving any thing to the perſon who looks after them, or his ſervants, they being maintain'd by the bounty of ſeveral charitable people. There is ſome difference between the Caravan-ſerahs of cities and thoſe of the country; the latter are ſpoken of in this place.

them to reſiſt time and the inclemencies of the weather. But things are now very much chang'd in this particular; for we never conſider whether what we do will be agreeable to poſterity, and generally labour only for ourſelves, and for the immediate gratification of our own taſtes.

Such Indians as are in good circumſtances, build pretty much after the manner of the Jews. Moſt of their houſes are flat at top like thoſe in Paleſtine, as indeed they generally are to this day in moſt hot countries. They have alſo a kind of gallery at the entrance of every houſe, which forms the front. 'Tis here they receive their viſits, and make their entertainments in rainy ſeaſons; for in fine weather, they have either tents or arbours in their court-yards, and in theſe ſhady places they feaſt and regale themſelves.

They never admit any perſon within their houſes, which is only for themſelves or their women. They likewiſe never have any window next the ſtreet, to prevent intrigues with their wives, for they are ſurprizingly jealous in this country. They not only never viſit the ladies, but dare not even enquire after them; and there could not be a worſe compliment made a man, than to ask him how his wife does; ſo that no perſon muſt ever mention their wives, no more than if they never had any. If a man ſhould, out of civility, enquire after their health, they would immediately reply, that none but themſelves are concern'd in their being well or ill; for as they were made for their uſe only, no man breathing, but themſelves, has a right to trouble their heads about their health, or to intermeddle in any of their concerns. But this is not all; for theſe queſtions, tho' altogether innocent, prove ſometimes fatal to the women enquired after. From what has been ſaid, we may judge how many people would be idle in thoſe countries, who are not ſo in Europe. 'Tis true indeed, that the confinement under which their women are kept, makes 'em ſeldom let ſlip any opportunity that offers itſelf, and that their men need only ſtand upon the defenſive.

XVI. Of the Black with which the Indian Women heighten the White of their Complexions; and of their Looking-glaſſes.

EZEKIEL repreſenting the idolatry of Jeruſalem under the figure of a lewd woman, reproaches her with painting her eyes when ſhe expected her lovers. We alſo read in the 2*d* book of Kings, that [b] Jezabel painted her face in order to make herſelf agreeable to Jehu, and to eſcape the death which ſhe knew ſhe juſtly deſerv'd for the great number of crimes ſhe had committed. As ſoon as Jezabel heard of Jehu's arrival, ſhe painted her eyes, and put her ornaments on her head. The compoſition ſhe uſed gave a black tincture to the eye, but this, according to the modern taſte, would ſcarce make a woman more killing. Nevertheleſs ſuch Indian women as are fair complexion'd, have the ſame cuſtom among them to this day. Theſe, in order to heighten the luſtre of their charms, and give their eyes a more languiſhing look, colour 'em round with a little black, which has pretty near the ſame effect with them, as the patching of our European ladies among us.

As to the ornaments of their women, I ſhall, by the way, make ſome mention of their glaſſes, and of the manner in which they are made. They are generally very ſmall, and made of braſs finely poliſh'd, which reflects the image very exactly. They were formerly antiently uſed by the Jews, and are ſtill to this day in ſeveral parts of Europe. The ſcripture tells us, that [a] Bezaleel made a laver of braſs, and the foot of it of braſs, and the looking-glaſſes of the women aſſembling, which aſſembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. I ſhall take the liberty of making ſome reflections on thoſe women who uſed to watch and pray at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, with regard to the conſequences which ſome authors have endeavoured to draw from the paſſage above-mentioned. Theſe have pretended to prove from thence, that under the written law there were nuns or virgins devoted to God, who had cells in the out-parts of the tabernacle. Such as give ſo remote an antiquity to monaſtic inſtitutions, ſeem too much prejudic'd in its favour. 'Tis enough that we allow this religious ſtate to be good in itſelf; that 'tis holy, and has a ſanction given to it by the church; without endeavouring to prove its inſtitution upwards of fifteen hundred years before Chriſt. Not to mention that there muſt have been a prodigious number of theſe nuns; that their Looking-glaſſes muſt have been very large, or that every recluſe had a great number of them; otherwiſe 'twould have been impoſſible to have made ſo great a brazen [b] veſſel out of 'em. Methinks that the two laſt articles ſeem very ill ſuited to nuns, who, tho' beautiful, ought not ſo much as remember that they have one handſome feature; and who, conſequently, have no manner of occaſion for ſo great a number of looking-glaſſes.

If it were true, that the monaſtic life was inſtituted in Moſes's time, what would become of the claim of the pretended ſucceſſors of Elias, who ſtrongly aſſert, that they themſelves firſt gave riſe to that inſtitution.

Theſe women who uſed to watch at the door of the tabernacle were not nuns, but ſecular women, whom devotion prompted to go and ſpend the night in prayer near the houſe of the Lord. This religious cuſtom was practis'd in the time of Eli the high-prieſt, and the debauching of theſe women was one of the crimes which his children had been guilty of. The ſcripture does not here employ the word excubabant, as in Exodus, [c] but that of obſervabant, which I believe ought to be tranſlated to meditate or reflect upon, and not to look after or watch: for there were Levites enough to guard the tabernacle, ſo that they had no occaſion to employ women for that purpoſe.

XVII. The Cuſtom the Indians have of letting their Nails grow.

BOTH men and women in India ſuffer their nails to grow prodigiouſly long, [d] which was alſo the cuſtom of the antient heathens: but the Jews, for fear leſt any impurity ſhould remain in them, and by that means might mix with their victuals, uſed to pare them very carefully, and oblig'd all their family to do the ſame. 'Tis for this reaſon that the ſcripture, when it allows 'em to marry ſuch women as they ſhould have taken priſoners in war, [e] commands them to firſt ſhave their heads, and likewiſe pare their nails.

XVIII. The Marriage-Ceremonies of the Indians.

WE meet with a parable in [a] St. Matthew, which I believe may be explain'd by one of the ceremonies of the Indians.

That evangeliſt ſpeaking of the five fooliſh virgins who had forgot to provide oil till the bridegroom was ready to enter in, ſays, [b] That at midnight there was a cry made, Behold the bridegroom cometh! go ye out to meet him.

This cuſtom for a man to go out on the eve of his wedding-day, and not to return till midnight, appears ſo extraordinary to us, that we might ask whether there were no law which oblig'd him to it, ſince he came back with great ceremony; there being women with torches in their hands, who were going to meet him, and a feaſt prepared againſt his coming.

We might eaſily anſwer this enquiry, were we to make it conſonant to the cuſtoms of the Indians; for among them, the bride and bridegroom ride together on their wedding-day in the ſame ſedan, the common vehicle of the country, which four men carry upon their ſhoulders; and ſet out about ſeven or eight in the evening, together with all their friends and relations, with trumpets ſounding and drums beating before them; and are lighted by a great number of Maſſals, a kind of torch I ſhall immediately deſcribe.

Several women walk behind the ſedan, ſinging verſes, in which they wiſh the new-married couple uninterrupted happineſs, in the ſame manner as the Greeks and Romans in their epithalamiums.

'Tis probable that theſe kind of publick ſingers are hinted at in the laſt chapter of [c] Eccleſiaſtes. They are likewiſe mention'd by [d] David.

In this manner the bride and bridegroom in India are carry'd up and down for ſome hours; after which they return home, where the women and ſervants wait their arrival. The whole houſe is illuminated with little lamps, and ſeveral Maſſals are ready lighted for their coming, beſides thoſe which go before the bride and bridegoom's ſedan.

Theſe Maſſals are made of ſeveral pieces of old linnen, knit very cloſe together circularly, and theſe they thruſt thro' a copper haſt or handle. They who hold a Maſſal in one hand, have a bottle made of the ſame metal with the haſt of their torches, in the other, and fill'd with oil, which they pour from time to time on the linnen-cloth above-mentioned, which ſerves to the ſame uſe as the wick of a candle among us; ſo that were they not to ſupply it with oil, it would immediately go out.

As ſoon as the new-married couple are got into the houſe, the bride withdraws with the women, and the bridegroom and his friends lay themſelves down on carpets or mats, and proviſion is immediately brought them. There is always a great number of people at theſe weddings, and I queſtion whether the Greeks had ſo many bride-folks at their nuptials as the Indians have.

There ſeems to be a conſiderable conformity between this cuſtom and the parable in the Goſpel. 'Tis probable that the Jews, at leaſt thoſe in our Saviour's time, had ſome ſuch ceremony among them; otherwiſe I cannot ſee how we can eaſily account for the return of the bridegroom at midnight, and for the feaſt which was made immediately after it. Nevertheleſs thoſe who have written on the Jewiſh traditions, don't make the leaſt mention of it.

[d] Pſal. lxvii. 26. He calls them, Juvenculas tympaniſtrias.

Our Saviour might poſſibly have borrowed that cuſtom from ſuch nations as border upon Judea, with whoſe laws and practices the Jews were probably acquainted.

'Twould be to no purpoſe to object, that 'twas only ſpoken parabolically, ſince all thoſe which our Saviour made uſe of were either founded on the cuſtoms of the Jews, or on thoſe of ſuch nations as lay near to Paleſtine.

XIX. Of the different Tribes or Caſtes among the Indians.

THE Heathen-Indians are divided into tribes, in the ſame manner as the Jews were antiently; but I could never find out the exact number of them: for every tribe, beſides the general diviſion, was ſub-divided into a numberleſs multitude of others, who all differ among themſelves, either with regard to their food, or ſome other circumſtance.

The Indians have given the name of Caſtes to what the Jews call'd tribes, but there is a much greater diſproportion between theſe Caſtes, than there was between the tribes of Iſrael, which however were not equal; for not to mention the ſuperiority which the prieſthood gave to that of Levi, there was alſo a rank or degree among the reſt. As for inſtance, that of Benjamin was the laſt, as is manifeſt from Saul and Samuel, when the [a] latter ſpake thus to him with regard to the ſhe-aſſes he was enquiring after; On whom is all the deſire of Iſrael? is it not on thee, and on all thy father's houſe? Saul reply'd, Am not I a Benjamite, of the ſmalleſt of the tribes of Iſrael?

However, notwithſtanding this ſuperiority, yet the members of the different tribes uſed to viſit one another, and eat together. They were even allow'd to marry into another tribe, provided the woman was not an heireſs; for they were forbid to [b] remove the inheritance of the children of Iſrael from tribe to tribe. Thus David, tho' of the tribe of Judah, married Michal, who was of the tribe of Benjamin, becauſe ſhe had no inheritance.

But the Indians are not allow'd that liberty; for ſome of their tribes are univerſally deſpis'd; as for inſtance, that of Parias. Any family that ſhould marry into ſuch tribes, would be polluted, as it were. The members of theſe are employ'd in the moſt ſervile offices, nor do they dare ſo much as to touch any of the others; and were they known to have the leaſt familiarity with them, they would immediately be baniſh'd from their reſpective tribes, and be look'd upon as infamous wretches.

There is nothing gives the miſſionaries ſo much trouble, or is ſo great an obſtacle to the converſion of the Heathen-Indians, as the deadly averſion the latter have for this tribe of Parias. They cannot prevail with themſelves to ſubmit to an injunction, which forces them, as it were, to receive the bleſſed ſacrament from the ſame hands as give it to the Parias; and conſequently makes them run the riſque of touching with their lips the ſame fingers which a Paria may have touch'd with his; ſo that they are oblig'd to uſe the utmoſt precautions in this delicate affair.

Nor will the Indians aſſemble in the ſame church with the Parias; which has oblig'd the Jeſuits, who were willing to indulge 'em in their weakneſs, to build a little chapel near their own church at Pondichery, for the conveniency of thoſe poor wretches; who, before this, were oblig'd, whenever they aſſiſted at divine ſervice, to ſtand in the open air, and be expos'd to the violent rains, or ſcorching heat of the ſun.

Some

[b] Num. xxxvi. 7. Ne commiſceatur poſſeſſio filiorum Iſrael de tribu in tribum, omnes enim viri ducent uxores de tribu & cognatione ſua.

Some would perhaps diſapprove this condeſcenſion, and alledge that as charity is the firſt effect of chriſtianity, the Indians ought not to be indulg'd in that horror and averſion they have for the Parias, whom baptiſm has made their brethren in Chriſt Jeſus; and that they ſhould leave no ſtone unturn'd to conquer, if poſſible, the natural antipathy which all the reſt of the tribes bear to them.

This is what the Jeſuits and Capuchins of Pondichery endeavour at, with a truly apoſtolical zeal. The gentlemen who are employ'd in foreign miſſions labour alſo to effect it with equal application: but ſuch frailties are not to be rooted out at once. We are bound in duty to have the utmoſt tenderneſs for a church which is but in its infancy, for a ſett of people that are fluctuating, as it were, between chriſtianity and idolatry, and whoſe hands are yet ſmoaking with the incenſe they had but juſt before offer'd to the falſe gods: we ought, I ſay, to have a much greater regard on this occaſion, than one ſhould have to a place where the chriſtian religion had long flouriſh'd, and been eſtabliſh'd from time immemorial.

As for inſtance, 'tis manifeſt from the Acts of the Apoſtles, that notwithſtanding the firſt preachers of the goſpel, aſſembled at Jeruſalem, had thought proper to oblige no longer all ſuch heathens as ſhould be [a] converted to chriſtianity to get themſelves circumcis'd; St. Paul nevertheleſs circumcis'd [b] Timothy, becauſe of the mortal averſion which the Jews, to whom he was going to preach the kingdom of heaven, had to all the uncircumciſed.

We alſo meet with a much greater inſtance of indulgence in the Old Teſtament, than the above-mentioned, and which, I am perſuaded, would not be allow'd under the chriſtian diſpenſation. 'Twas that of Naaman, commander of the king of Syria's armies, whom Eliſha cured of his leproſy. Naaman promiſed the prophet that he would wholly relinquiſh the worſhip of idols, and acknowledge no other Being than the true God, to whom he owed his cure. However, as his employment oblig'd him to accompany his ſovereign to the temple of Rimmon, and to wait upon him as his eſquire upon that occaſion; he [c] beſought Eliſha to intreat the Lord to pardon him, in caſe it ſhould ſo happen, that when the king lean'd upon his ſhoulder to worſhip the idol, he alſo ſhould adore it, or bow down before it. By the anſwer Eliſha made him, one would be apt to think he conſented to it, ſince he reply'd only, Go in peace; at leaſt we cannot ſay that he condemn'd him for it.

The only reaſon of my quoting theſe inſtances, was to ſhew, that ſome indulgence may be allow'd to the hardneſs of mens hearts; eſpecially when ſuch things don't ſtrike directly at the foundation of religion; but on the contrary, when the not allowing them would be of very dangerous conſequence. However, perſons ſo indulg'd ought not to lay it down as a maxim that is to be always obſerv'd; nor conſider that as an expreſs leave and a poſitive conſent, which was no more than a mere indulgence, eſpecially if they had been told ſo beforehand.

As theſe ſubjects are of a very nice and delicate nature, ſo they ought to be handled with the utmoſt prudence and judgment. Theſe, perhaps, are the two moſt eſſential qualifications required in a miſſionary; but I am perſuaded that thoſe holy labourers in the Lord's vine-yard, are thoroughly poſſeſt of them. We may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that heaven beſtows on all thoſe, whom he inſpires with the holy reſolution of labouring at the converſion of the heathens in the Indies, all the virtues requiſite for ſuch a weighty employment; at leaſt, charity obliges us to think ſo.

We

[c] 4 Reg. v. 18. Hoc autem ſolùm eſt, de quo deprecaberis Dominum pro ſervo tuo; quando ingredietur dominus meus templum Rimmon, ut adoret, & illo innitente ſuper manum meam, ſi adoravero in templo Rimmon, ut ignoſcat mihi dominus ſervo tuo pro hac re.

We are to hope, that ſome expedient will in time be found out, to root out, by inſenſible degrees, the averſion which all the tribes of the Indians in general, bear to that of the Parias. It frequently happens, that time only applies a remedy to many things, which might at firſt have been attempted to no purpoſe, or at leaſt not without great danger. We are not to doubt, but that when thoſe prudent ſpiritual directorsſhall meet with the leaſt opportunity of inſtilling into them the pure and uncorrupted maxims of the chriſtian religion, and charity, which is its very eſſence; 'tis not, I ſay, to be doubted, but they will ſet about it with all imaginable zeal and fervour.

This diſtinction of tribes and families, and the great care which was taken not to marry into ſtrange families, gave a ſanction in antient times to near relations to marry with one another, which in our days would be look'd upon as inceſtuous. As for inſtance, [a] Jacob, rather than marry a Canaanitiſh woman, took to wife Leah and Rachel his couſin-germains, who likewiſe were ſiſters. Such marriages were common enough before the written-law, and in proceſs of time things were carried to very great lengths. Solon allow'd the marrying of brothers and ſiſters together, in Athens, provided they were not born from the ſame mother; Lycurgus, on the contrary, permitted thoſe who were in the ſame degree of conſanguinity to marry together, provided they were not born of the ſame father: but as for the [b] Egyptians, they allow'd both. The Perſians had marriages that were ſtill more ſhocking, for a ſon was permitted to marry his mother; according to Philo, all perſons of diſtinction among them uſed to marry in this manner, and the children that ſprung from theſe marriages were had in the utmoſt veneration, and were even thought the moſt worthy of ſucceeding to the throne. They affirm'd, that a man boaſted the greater perfection, the leſs his blood was mix'd with other ſtreams.

XX. Of the Heads of each Tribe or Caſte.

EACH Caſte has a chief ſet over it, whoſe buſineſs it is to maintain its privileges, and to take care that the laws be obſerv'd in it; and in general, that every thing be done in it with order and regularity. Whenever any thing is to be tranſacted which regards the whole nation in general, as for inſtance, their cuſtoms, rights, proceſſes, or thoſe of government in general; theſe Heads aſſemble together to enquire into them, when they give judgment as they judge proper.

Theſe [c] princes of tribes were called heads among the Jews; and the ſcripture ſpeaks of them, where it is ſaid, that they were ſitting on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Iſrael. They are frequently ſpoken of in [d] Deuteronomy. No conſiderable affair was tranſacted without their conſent: and as each head of a tribe was impower'd to force all his people to follow the laws which God had ſet them, as well as to apply a remedy to thoſe abuſes which ſtruck at his divine Majeſty; God always began by puniſhing thoſe heads, for whatever evils they had ſuffer'd to paſs uncenſur'd. We ſee in the book of Numbers, that when the Iſraelites, ſeduc'd by the Moabitiſh women, worſhip'd [e] Baal-peor; God commanded Moſes to begin by hanging up all the princes of Iſrael, or heads of the tribes.

The Greeks likewiſe had perſons of diſtinction among them, who preſided over the ten quarters or wards into which the city of Athens was divided, which the Athenians call'd Phule. Theſe Phule's were exactly the ſame as the tribes among the Jews, and and ſuch as preſided over them were call'd Archipulo's, Phularco's, Arco's, or Archego's.

The Iſhmaelites alſo divided their families into tribes. There were twelve of them, each had its head or prince, as we find it in the [a] ſcripture.

The firſt founders of monarchies, who afterwards became ſo famous in the world, were no more than chiefs of tribes, and aſſum'd no other title than that of firſt among their equals: but afterwards abuſing the reſpect and deference which the people paid them, they at laſt laid aſide the quality of father, and aſſum'd that of emperor and king, and even frequently chang'd the title of protector into that of tyrant and uſurper.

XXI. The Excommunicated among the Indians.

THE Indians have alſo their excommunicated perſons, and cut off ſuch perſons from ſociety, much after the ſame manner as the Jews did formerly. This the Indians call, loſing the Caſte; that is, the being no longer number'd among the members of their tribes. Such as incur thoſe cenſures, are look'd upon as infamous wretches, and univerſally ſhunn'd; nor is this all, for all who keep company with them, are had in as great deteſtation, and are alſo caſt out of their tribes. Thoſe are ſo odious to the reſt, that they immediately break to pieces all ſuch brittle veſſels as they had made uſe of. The ſame is done when a ſtranger or Paria happens to touch any of their pots; for every thing thoſe excommunicated perſons have once touch'd, is thought to be profan'd.

The moſt uſual ſubjects for excommunication are theſe; the drinking wine, the feeding on cows-fleſh, the eating with ſtrangers or Paria's, or even the touching any thing which they had dreſs'd. When once a man is declar'd fallen from his Caſte, it coſts him a great ſum of money to be reſtor'd to it; not to mention a great number of ablutions, which they were oblig'd to obſerve, in order to waſh off that impurity they pretend he had contracted.

All the heathens of antiquity had in like manner their excommunicated perſons, who were not allow'd to approach their temples, or thoſe ſacred groves where ſacrifices were made, and prayers offer'd up to the gods. Before the ceremony began, the [b] prieſt always gave notice to all ſuch perſons, whoſe actions had render'd them unworthy of partaking in thoſe holy myſteries, to retire at a diſtance; in order that they might not, by their preſence, pollute thoſe holy places which were ſet apart for the worſhipping of the Deity.

Procul ô! procul eſte profani!
All ye profane at diſtance ſtand!

This was one of the forms of ſpeech which their prieſts made uſe of. By excommunication we underſtand aſeparating or cutting off from our communion, like that of profanus or profane, which among the antients, ſignify'd a man who was driven away from the temples and ſacrifices: for profanus ſignifies as it were procul à fano, or far off from the temple.

[a] Geneſ. xxv. 16. Iſti ſunt filii Iſmaelis; & hæc nomina per caſtella, & oppida eorum, duodecim principes tribuum ſuarum.

[b] The ſame Cuſtom is obſerv'd among the chriſtians, who excommunicate the profane in a ſolemn manner, and forbid them to partake in the myſteries of the bleſſed ſacrament; this is obſerv'd both by proteſtants and papiſts.

XXII. Their Manner of laying out, and watering their Gardens.

SOLOMON takes pleaſure in relating the ſeveral diverſions he had given into, in order to paſs life away in the moſt delightful and agreeable manner poſſible; [a] and to enjoy what at leaſt had the appearance of felicity. He ſays, among other particulars, that he had made him pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees.

I preſume that the moſt natural way of explaining this paſſage according to our cuſtoms, would be to ſay, that by the wood which bringeth forth trees, is meant a nurſery of trees, in which the young plants are generally ſet as thick, as they are in a foreſt. However, I believe we are thereby to underſtand, all thoſe gardens in general which Solomon had planted after his being rais'd to the throne; for the gardens among the Jews were in reality no other than foreſts of fruit-trees, for which reaſon they are generally call'd Pomaria or orchards in ſcripture.

The gardens of the Indians are laid out much after the ſame manner, they being made of a confuſed medley of all kinds of trees, moſt of them planted without ſymmetry or order, which however are pleaſant enough; and I ſhould prefer them in hot countries to large open walks, with their ſeveral parterres, which tho they are agreeable to the eye, yet as they don't ſhelter from the ſcorching rays of the ſun, they therefore ſuit very ill with thoſe countries.

The Indians have alſo ſuch pools or ponds as Solomon tells us he had made for the watering of this foreſt or grove of young trees. It may not perhaps be improper to give the reader an account of the uſes they are apply'd to in India.

Every Garden has generally a great well or a kind of pond in it, which is fill'd with rain-water. Juſt by it is a baſon made of brick, rais'd about two foot from the ground. Whenever they have a mind to water it, they fill it with water from the well or pool, which falls thro' a hole made in the bottom of it, into a canal divided into ſeveral other little ones, by which means it conveys, as it runs from the baſon, water to the foot of every tree, or bed of roots and pulſe. When the gardeners think they have imbib'd enough, they either ſtop, or divert the canals, with clods of earth.

The Romans uſed alſo to water their gardens and meadows in the ſame manner. Virgil ſpeaks of theſe rivulets or canals, when he ſays, Claudite jam rivos, pueri, ſat prata biberunt.

The Italians have alſo retain'd this cuſtom, which is alſo follow'd by moſt Eaſterns, and is vaſtly more convenient than the method we make uſe of; for by the help of theſe canals, they water a large garden in leſs time than we with our pots can water a ſingle bed.

[a] Eccleſ. ii. 6. Et extruxi mihi piſcinas, ut irrigarem ſylvam lignorum germinantium.

XXIII. Of their Averſion to every thing that is repugnant to Decorum.

Theophraſtus aſſures us in his Characters, that in Athens, which in his time was the center of all politeneſs, ſome men were ſo ſcrupulous, as not to paſs thro' a place where they had ſeen a bird of evil augury, without firſt throwing three little ſtones in the way, or ſpitting in their boſoms, in order to divert the ill conſequences of the omen.

We meet with ſeveral people in India who are equally ſcrupulous. As I was one day at Balaſſor, a heathen Indian ſtopt ſhort on a ſudden, and look'd for three ſtones, which having found, he threw them into a place through which he was to paſs, and where he had ſeen a French Sailor in a very indecent, tho' neceſſary poſture. They have a particular averſion to any ſuch ſpectacle, and whenever nature obliges them to evacuate, they always endeavour to do it in the moſt private manner poſſible.

Now I am mentioning the prodigious averſion the Indians have to any thing which claſhes ever ſo little with decency, I ſhall compare one of their cuſtoms with a practice which an antient [a] Greek Poet has recommended in his works. This poet willing to inſpire his countrymen the Greeks with every thing that might promote politeneſs in ſociety; adviſes them not to eaſe nature in the high-ways, nor in any place whatſoever but in a decent way, either ſtooping or againſt a wall. The [b] Jews were full as delicate upon this article. The Indians ſtoop ſo low on this occaſion, that one would almoſt think they ſat down. They abhor thoſe who either eaſe nature ſtanding; in places expos'd to publick view, or with their faces turn'd towards the ſun.

XXIV. Of the Preſages they draw from the Noiſe of Crows, &c.

THO' crows are very common in India, the heathens nevertheleſs look upon 'em as birds of evil augury, particularly the Banians, who are a particular tribe, that exerciſe traffic only, as was before obſerv'd. They would not undertake any affair, tho' of the greateſt conſequence, if they ſhould happen to find a crow at the door, at their going out in the morning.

'Tis thus the antients, when any crow had open'd his throat at their doors in the morning, look'd on it as a very ill omen. [c] Heſiod forbid the leaving of any houſe unfiniſh'd, for fear leſt a crow ſhould ſet in it, and make a noiſe.

Nor are the Europeans wholly free from this ſuperſtitious notion; and I myſelf have heard the ignorant people in France ſay, that when a crow or ſcreech-owl, on the houſe-top, were heard before day, 'twas an infallible ſign that ſomebody in it would die. We muſt aſcribe this ſuperſtitious notion to the inclination which the common people obſerve theſe birds have naturally to dead bodies and all kind of filth. Add to this, their harſh and mournful notes, which alone is ſufficient to ſtrengthen this ſuperſuperſtitious notion. Some affirm that theſe animals, whenever a perſon is very much out of order, know it by the ſmell; and as they naturally love ſtench and corruption, they always come as near as poſſible to thoſe whoſe diſſolution approaches.

XXV. The Averſion which the Indians have to Rats, which nevertheleſs ſome of them feed upon.

THE Indians, as has been already obſerv'd, abſtain from eating certain animals, out of veneration and reſpect: but then there are others they never touch, becauſe of the great averſion they have to them, and their conſidering them as unclean. If ever they preſume to eat of them, they render themſelves liable to be ejected from their tribe; not to mention that it brands them with ignominy.

Of all animals, rats are their greateſt averſion, tho' ſome eat them publickly; but theſe run no riſque with regard to their tribes, becauſe they cannot fall any lower than they are. Such are thoſe who carry the ſedans, and go by the name of Boe's.

'Tis well known that this animal was mortally hated by the Jews, and that they were forbid to eat it, as is manifeſt from chap. xi. verſ. 9. of Leviticus [a]. Nevertheleſs we meet with [b] Jews who violated it, as appears from the laſt chapter of Iſaiah, where that prophet threatens all ſuch [c] Jews with divine vengeance, as ſhould eat ſwine, or mouſe-fleſh, and ſuch like abominations. He adds, that they ſhall all be conſum'd together.

XXVI. Of the Burials of the Indians.

THE Indians have no ſtated manner of burying their dead, for ſome throw them into the Ganges, others bury, and others again burn them.

Thoſe who inter them, always carry rice, fruits and flowers to their graves for ſeveral days together; which cuſtom was alſo practis'd by the antient [d] heathens, and had even crept into the church for ſeveral centuries together. This was ſome of the reliques of heatheniſm, for which St. Auguſtin reproach'd the chriſtians in his time.

But they take ſtrict care, whether they bury or burn their dead, to waſh 'em very clean firſt, and afterwards rub them with oil. The antients uſed to obſerve religiouſly this cuſtom of waſhing the dead bodies before they put 'em into the graves, by which means they knew infallibly whether the perſon interr'd was really dead or in a lethargy only; for had he ever ſo little ſenſation left, this water drew him out of it; particularly ſince the water uſed on this occaſion, was often boiling hot. The cuſtom of waſhing dead bodies before they are buried, is ſtill obſerv'd in ſeveral parts of Europe; but then the water is but luke-warm, and is intended only to clean the corps.

The

[a] Beſides the argument which may be drawn in favour of this Prohibition, viz. that thoſe animals delight and feed on unclean things, we may juſtly aſſert, that God forbid the Jews to eat them, becauſe they were uſed in the religious myſteries of the Idolaters. Such was ſwines fleſh, &c.

[b] This indeed is true; but then they were Jewiſh idolaters, who eat rat's fleſh from a religious principle. Thoſe animals were uſed in luſtrations.

[c] Iſai. lxvi. 17. Qui comedebant carnem ſuillam, & abominationem, & murem ſimul conſumentur, dicit Dominus.

[d] 'Twas a cuſtom among the Greeks to offer wine and honey on the graves of their dead. Every deceas'd Perſon among the Athenians paid two meaſures of Barley and the like quantity of wheat, as a tribute to Minerva's prieſteſs; not to mention a little piece of money which the deceas'd held in his mouth, to give to Charon for his paſſage over the Styx.

The Jews commonly waſh'd their dead, as we find it practis'd with regard to the body of [a] Tabitha, which cuſtom was alſo uſed by the chriſtians. [b] St. Gregory of Tours relates, that St. Pelagia, in conformity to this cuſtom, was waſh'd when ſhe was laid in a coffin, and afterwards carried to church.

The Jews not only waſh'd the bodies of their dead, but alſo embalm'd them and rubb'd them with aromatic ſpices, in order to keep them as long as poſſible from rotting, particularly thoſe of their princes. Thus Joſeph cauſed the body of his father Jacob to be embalm'd, as were afterwards the bodies of the kings of Iſrael and Judah. Some nevertheleſs were depriv'd of this honour, as Jehoram king of Judah, who was buried in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors, without being embalm'd, or having any of thoſe honours paid to his obſequies which are generally obſerv'd on thoſe occaſions.

I believe this is the only ſenſe that can be given to that paſſage in the Chronicles, where it is ſaid, [c] they did not do the ſame with regard to him, as they had done to his anceſtors. They were oblig'd to make the body paſs thro' the fire before they embalm'd it, and it was neceſſary that the ſeveral odoriferous ſpices which were employ'd on that occaſion, ſuch as myrrh, frankincenſe, gum-arabic, cedar, water, ſhould be boiling hot, in order to pierce the better through the pores of the body; ſo that the anointing dead bodies with theſe drugs, and putting them into the body, according to the uſual cuſtom, was burning them.

The Jews learnt this cuſtom of embalming from the Egyptians; and thoſe bodies ſo embalm'd are call'd mummies. Several of theſe are to be ſeen in our Muſeums in Europe, one of the fineſt of which is in Leyden. It has all its teeth; its skin is black, and pretty much wrinkled; and 'tis wrap'd up in ſwathes which are fill'd with gum: its arms are behind, like thoſe of a child in ſwadling-clothes. 'Tis very ſurprizing how theſe aromatic ſpices cou'd have preſerv'd theſe bodies entire for perhaps near three thouſand years.

Honey has ſometimes been made uſe of in preſerving bodies, and to prevent their rotting. Nicephorus [d] relates, that thoſe who accompanied St. Epiphanius, preſerv'd his body in this manner, when they were carrying it to Cyprus.

But to return to the Indians, they likewiſe have thoſe perſons at their Burials, who in ſcripture are call'd tibicines mortuorum. Theſe are men who walk a little before the dead body, [e] and ſound a long trumpet, whoſe mournful notes well ſuit this melancholy ceremony.

Before the Great Mogul had made himſelf maſter of the Indies, when the heathens were govern'd by their particular princes, every woman at the death of her husband, who was always burn'd, was bound in duty to burn herſelf on the ſame pile, and to hold the corps upon her knees; and thus the fire conſum'd the [f] living with the dead.

She was, I ſay, bound in duty to do it, for tho' ſhe was not abſolutely oblig'd to burn herſelf, and that the parents of the deceas'd had not a right to force her to it, ſhe yet lay under a pretty great conſtraint, ſince ſhe might expect to ſpend the remaining part of her life in the moſt miſerable manner, in caſe ſhe refus'd to follow her husband;

[e] This cuſtom was alſo obſerv'd by the Greeks and Romans. May not that of ringing bells for the deceas'd, as 'tis practis'd in Roman catholic countries at this time, be juſtly thought to have ſome affinity to it?

[f] The heathen idolaters obſerve this cuſtom in our age, but leſs zealouſly than formerly.

husband; for ſhe became the ſlave, as it were, of her late husband's relations, who always treated her in ſuch a cruel and contemptuous manner, as was a thouſand times more grievous than death itſelf.

She nevertheleſs had one way leſt to eſcape death, and at the ſame time the ill treatment of the above-mention'd, which was to turn common ſtrumpet. For in this caſe her husband's relations had no manner of authority over her, the laws expreſſly forbidding any perſon to uſe thoſe women ill.

Tis theſe women who uſually go in companies to ſing and dance at weddings, at publick rejoicings, and in all places where they may be ſent for. Theſe, ſo long as they have any charms leſt, meet with a handſome reception every where, tho' every one is acquainted with their character: but no ſooner is their beauty gone, than they fall into the moſt miſerable circumſtances, and think it a great happineſs when any any of the young fry condeſcend to keep them as ſervants.

[a] As it reflected a great diſhonour on the family of a man whoſe wife refuſed to be burnt along with him, they always did their utmoſt to perſuade her to it; to ſucceed the better, they always began to argue with her when her grief was at the height, and at a time when ſhe ſeem'd moſt concern'd at the death of her husband. On theſe occaſions they always expatiated upon the good qualities of the deceas'd, ſetting the love and tenderneſs he bore to her in the ſtrongeſt colours poſſible. In a word, they ſet every engine at work to melt, if poſſible, the heart of the afflicted widow, and by that means they at laſt prevail'd with her to reſolve not to ſurvive her deceas'd Huſband. Whenever ſhe had conſented to it, before three or four Perſons, ſhe was not allow'd to recede from her engagement, no more than thoſe who had promiſed to be buried in the Ganges. But then ſhe had the conſolation of being applauded to the ſkies; was accompanied with drums and trumpets; had garlands made her of all kinds of flowers, and the Bramins promis'd her an eternity of bliſs. Such were the artifices which they employ'd, in order to make thoſe women ſubmit to this cruel cuſtom.

She was led in a ceremonious manner to the funeral pile; while they were ſetting fire to it, the drums and trumpets made a prodigious noiſe, in order to drown her dying cries.

The Ammonites had alſo the ſame cuſtom in the worſhip of the idol [b] Moloch, when making it burning hot, they put a child in its arms, where it conſum'd in the flames. The noiſe which the drums made, in order to drown the groans of the dying children, made 'em give the name of Thophet, which in Hebrew ſignifies a drum, to the valley where thoſe abominable ſacrifices were perform'd.

But this horrid cuſtom has been very much oppos'd ever ſince the Mahometan religion has prevail'd in a great part of India. They have even laid a great tax on the relations of all thoſe women as ſhould be burnt; ſo that they don't burn them as much as they uſed to do formerly.

I have endeavour'd to diſcover the riſe of this cruel cuſtom, but with no great ſucceſs. All the Indians ſay, is, that women uſed formerly to poiſon their husbands upon the leaſt ſubject of diſcontent; for which reaſon, the men, in order not only to prevent wives ſhortning their husbands days, but on the contrary, to engage them to do their utmoſt to prolong them, had made it very ignominious for any woman to ſurvive her husband. So that ſeeing themſelves either bound in honour to die with their husbands, or be forc'd by cuſtom to ſpend the reſt of their days miſerably, they were oblig'd to exert themſelves for their preſervation, whatever might be their reſolution.

Many

[a] The reader will obſerve, that the author always ſpeaks of this cuſtom as tho' it were generally aboliſh'd: notwithſtanding which, 'tis only ſo in ſome places.

[b] The author might have found a better example among the antients, to put in parallel with that of theſe Indian women. He here would have met with women who ſacrificed themſelves in this manner to the Manes of their Husbands; and would have read of Thracian women in Herodotus, who eagerly ſtrove to be burnt with their husbands.

Many a woman who ſeem'd to be very careful of her husband's welfare, might in reality have herſelf only in view; and others, whoſe tears might ſeem to flow for the loſs of a dear husband, might perhaps bewail themſelves only.

The inhabitants of Guinea have pretty near the ſame cuſtom, where, when any great man dies, they not only put his beſt-beloved wives to death, but alſo thoſe ſervants whom he moſt eſteem'd; in order, ſay they, to keep him company and attend upon him in the other world. At that rate there would be no great pleaſure in being miſtreſs to a Negro of quality; and I am perſuaded, that were our religion to admit ſuch a cuſtom, our nobles would find the Fair more cruel than they are; celibacy wou'd undoubtedly be infinitely more in vogue; nor would a wedded life be much courted by the maidens.

XXVII. Of their Fryars, call'd Fakirs.

IT has been ſaid in all ages that the devil has his martyrs, but there are as many of theſe in India as in any part of the world. We there ſee Fakirs, who are properly the monks of this country, that outdo whatever we read of the antient Anchorets, who ſpent their whole lives in the moſt ſevere penance and mortification.

Several of theſe Fakirs make a vow, of continuing all their life-time in one poſture, and keep it effectually. Others never lie down, or continue all their lives in a ſtanding poſture, ſupported only by a ſtick or rope under their arm-pits; and others again ſtand with their arms always rais'd on high. There are ſome who endeavour to mortify and torture themſelves by auſterities ſtill infinitely more rigid; theſe mangle their bodies with ſcourges or knives. They look upon themſelves as no longer of this world, and as they fancy they have triumph'd over every paſſion, and are in a ſtate of innocence, many of them either walk up and down, or diſcover their naked bodies in public; not even concealing thoſe parts, which modeſty would have hid.

Theſe Fakirs are not the only perſons who have pretended to have conquer'd their paſſions, and all thoſe impulſes which may be rais'd by the ſight of a naked body. We had the Adamites, who ſprung from the ſect of the Carpocratians and Gnoſticks. Theſe, as [a] St. Auſtin informs us, uſed to aſſemble together naked, to hear lectures, to read, pray and receive the communion. St. Epiphanius has been made to ſpeak a little too harſhly of theſe hereticks, and they have made uſe of his [b] authority to prove, that they committed the moſt infamous actions in theſe aſſemblies, and that they abſolutely rejected the uſe of prayer. Nevertheleſs 'tis plain, that St. Auſtin ſays expreſſly, as we before obſerv'd, that they uſed to pray; and St. Epiphanius himſelf [c] ſays, that they follow'd the inſtitutions of the monks, by obſerving celibacy and condemning marriage: ſo that there is no room to believe they would have committed all thoſe crimes which are laid to their charge in the infancy of their ſect. But ſome writers tell us, that they afterwards degenerated; and that that nakedneſs which they at firſt thought would infallibly reſtore them to the ſtate of innocence, and make 'em like Adam before his fall, was afterwards the occaſion of their giving into the moſt horrid exceſſes and irregularities; which indeed is probable enough.

The common-people are thoroughly perſuaded of the virtue and innocence of the Fakirs, but to convince them of it, they muſt appear wholly diſengag'd from all ſuch things as flatter the ſenſes, and lay aſide all claim to the things of this world. Moſt of of 'em act their part very well in publick, but then they are accus'd of committing enormous crimes in private; but perhaps all is not true that is related of them.

We read in the firſt book of Kings, the odd manner in which the prieſts of Baal uſed to honour their god; how they invok'd him, and endeavour'd to obtain ſome favour from him, by flaſhing themſelves with knives and lancets. We are alſo told in [a] ſcripture, that the above-mentioned, in order to draw down fire from heaven upon their ſacrifices, uſed to make their bodies run down with blood. The auſterities and mortifications of the Fakirs, may be put in [b] parallel with them. Some of theſe go ſtill farther, and make a vow, to go and roul themſelves a certain number of leagues, over every thing that comes in their way, not ſtopping at ſtones or briars, ſo that they tear their bodies to pieces; notwithſtanding which, this manner of mortification is pretty much uſed among the Indians.

They have alſo another kind of Fakirs, who don't practiſe ſuch ſevere auſterities, or rather, who are not quite ſo extravagant: theſe flock together in companies, and go from one village to another, propheſying abundance, or threatning barrenneſs, according to the good or bad reception they meet with. They alſo pretend to tell fortunes, to promiſe children to ſuch as have none, and husbands to all ſuch virgins as are weary of being ſo any longer; but then they are wicked villains, whom it would be dangerous for a man to meet in any lone place, unleſs he were able to defend himſelf; but notwithſtanding this, the Indian idolaters have them in the utmoſt veneration. The Moors have alſo their Fakirs, who, tho' as worthleſs wretches as the above-mention'd, 'tis yet a capital crime to beat them.

We might in ſome meaſure compare the manner in which the Fakirs publiſh their fanatical viſions and their pretended predictions, with that of the prophets among the antient Jews, whom the ſcripture calls, Filii prophetarum, grex, vel chorus prophetarum. Such were thoſe whom Saul met with, and in the midſt of whom he propheſied. [c] The ſcripture tells us, that they employ'd trumpets and drums on theſe occaſions, and that they always gave out their prophecies to the ſound of theſe inſtruments.

It alſo relates, that when Jehoſhaphat, Jehoram, and the king of Edom were aſſembled againſt Meſha king of Moab, their army being reduced to the greateſt extremity for want of water; Jehoſhaphat ſent for Eliſha, in order to draw down the aſſiſtance of heaven by his prayers, and that this prophet demanded a minſtrel before he conſulted the [d] Lord.

[e] Might we not, in order to juſtify this extraordinary manner of conſulting God, and to explain it in a natural way, take the liberty of advancing, that the mind is more apt to receive the commands of the divine Being, and liſtens more atttentively to

[a] 3 Reg. xviii. 28. Clamabant ergo voce magnâ, & incidebant ſe juxtà ritum ſuum cultris & lanceolis: donec perfunderentur ſanguine.

[b] If there are any things among the antients that may juſtly be compar'd to thoſe puniſhments which the Fakirs inflict upon themſelves from a religious motive, 'tis the voluntary caſtration of the prieſts of Atys and Cybele in honour of thoſe Gods; the devoting of one's ſelf to death; the ſevere and rigid life of certain ſects of philoſophers, particularly the antient Gymnoſophiſts, whom theſe Fakirs reſemble very much; the ſprinkling which the prieſts of Bellona uſed to perform in honour of that Goddeſs with their own blood; the devout ſcourgings which they oblig'd certain young men in Lacedæmonia to undergo, &c. But we meet with greater inſtances of this among the moderns; and not to mention the Capuchins and the Monks of La Trape, Saint Roſe will for ever be an aſtoniſhing example of the tortures which certain devotees inflict upon their own bodies.

[d] 4 Reg. iii. 15. Nunc autem adducite mihi Pſalteria, cumque caneret Pſaltes, facta eſt ſuper eum manus Domini & dixit.

[e] 'Tis impoſſible to produce any certain or ſatisfactory arguments on that head. 'Tis undoubtedly very ſurprizing to think, that muſic ſhould call down the ſpirit of God upon the prophets. And might we not ſuppoſe, that the aſſembly of prophets, ſuch as thoſe among whom king Saul was, were not true prophets, but a ſett of people who ſung hymns, and prais'd God to the ſounds of inſtruments of muſic; and that the ſcripture might call this propheſying?

But

to his voice, in theſe ſeaſons when it has leſs communication as it were with the body; or when the body is leſs capable of ſetting ſuch objects before it, as may call off its attention. All ſuch things, as had the power of throwing the ſenſes into a kind of lethargy, or that took off their attention from all thoſe objects which were capable of diſturbing them, prepar'd the minds of the prophets for receiving the ſpirit of God; and 'tis certain, that nothing was better adapted to that purpoſe than voices, inſtruments, and all kind of muſic, whoſe ſounds ſuſpend, as it were, all the faculties of the ſoul, and raiſe it to extaſy [a].

'Tis in this manner that the Indian Fakirs in queſtion, employ drums, trumpets and other muſical inſtruments to rouze their ſouls, and enable them the better to publiſh their pretended prophecies, in an artificial or voluntary extaſy. We always meet with one of theſe, who ſeems to be inſpired with a kind of fury, the violent agitations of whoſe body, correſpond with the ſudden and irregular cadence of thoſe inſtruments. No ſooner have they work'd themſelves out of breath, but they pronounce certain ſentences, which the heathens conſider as ſo many oracles and prophecies.

The Jews were ſo much uſed to ſee their prophets in theſe extaſies, whenever they were going to pronounce their prophecies, that they generally gave the [b] name of prophet to the frantic, and uſed to cry out, when the fit came upon them, that they propheſied. The ſcripture uſes this very expreſſion in a paſſage where Saul is mention'd; for, in order to denote his becoming frantic, and that his body writh'd in a variety of violent poſtures, it expreſſes it thus, [c] he propheſied.

Whether what we read in the poets and in Lactantius concerning the Sybils, be really genuine, or only a fiction as ſeveral very learned men have ſuppos'd; 'tis certain the antients were of opinion, that a man, in order to his being fill'd with the ſpirit of a God, muſt become frantic; muſt have his hair ſtand erect; have a trembling in all his limbs, and pronounce a ſett of inarticulate words. This, at leaſt, was the vulgar opinion; which, indeed, can hardly excite our wonder.

Men

But if we underſtand this expreſſion, as ſignifying an inward emotion, which diſpoſes the devout ſoul to a more ſtrict intimacy with its God; to converſe with him in deep meditation, and by that means fit itſelf for the receiving the gift of inſpiration; 'tis certain that inſtrumental muſic, when it accompanies the ſinging of hymns, is capable of diſpoſing it for all theſe things. The buſineſs is to determine the qualities of this muſic, in order to its being lawful, juſt, and applicable to true inſpiration. For 'tis very certain, that muſic had the ſame effect on the minds of the prieſts and prophets of the antient heathens, as it had on thoſe of the antient Jews: but 'tis this difference that we are now ignorant of. Nor have we a better idea of the relation which might have been between muſic and the interceſſion of Eliſha. Was it that he ſtood in need of muſic to raiſe his ſoul to prayer? was it that he requir'd vocal and inſtrumental, to keep his ſenſes in a ſtate of extaſy, and fix his ſoul on God only? or rather, was it not a ceremony which had been inſtituted merely to fix the attention of the auditors? and was it not expedient for them to act thus on this occaſion, ſince they were before an idolatrous and ſuperſtitious king of Iſrael, who, as he had been uſed to this practice in the worſhip of his Gods, would therefore probably have deſpiſed Eliſha's prayers, had they not been accompanied with the ſame ceremonies as were uſed in his religion? But theſe are mere conjectures; however, be this as it will, God has very often graciouſly condeſcended to adapt himſelf to theſe prejudices, which the ſplendor of ſuperſtitious cuſtoms inſpire.

[a] Altho' muſic acts immediately on the organ of hearing only, nevertheleſs there is a ſtrong relation between it and the other ſenſes, from that very relation which all the ſenſes have with each other. Daily experience ſhews, that when one of the ſenſes is ſtrongly affected, all the reſt ſeem to ſuſpend their functions. Thus, whenever we feel any acute pain, not one ſingle object ſtrikes the eye diſtinctly, and our ears are ſtruck with nothing but a confus'd aſſemblage of ſounds. The ſame may be ſaid of the other ſenſes.

[b] 'Tis true indeed, that the heathens gave the name of fury to the enthuſiaſm of their prophets. The Greek and Latin Poets expreſs enthuſiaſm and inſpiration by the word fury: but without quoting paſſages to that purpoſe, we ſhall only refer the reader to Virgil's Sybil, in the 6th book of the Æneis. Nevertheleſs, we defy the author of this diſſertation to prove, that either the inſpir'd writers, or the heathen poets, gave the name of prophets to furious or frantic perſons. The ſcripture indeed obſerves, that when the evil ſpirit came upon Saul, he had all the agitations of the prophets, but ſtill does not ſay that he propheſied. The ſignification of the word prophet would be ſtrangely abus'd, were it to be apply'd to all perſons in general, who ſhould be ſeiz'd with madneſs; and we believe it would be impoſſible to quote one inſtance, where a metaphor is more ſtrain'd than in this place.

[c] 1 Reg xviii. 10. Poſt diem autem alteram, invaſit ſpiritus Dei malus Saul, & prophetabat in medio domus ſuæ. See the two preceeding notes.

Men who ſpend their lives without any ſettled principle, or the aſſiſtance of any other light but that of nature, and their irregular imaginations, are always in ſearch of ſuch things as appear moſt wonderful, and have the higheſt idea of whatever they don't underſtand. One wou'd even imagine, that theſe people find a kind of pleaſure in every thing that fills 'em with dread; in which they reſemble children, who delight to hear ſurprizing or melancholy ſtories; and who take a pleaſure in hearing old womens tales of hob-goblins and witches, tho' they are frighted at the ſame time.

Mankind uſed formerly to ſwallow greedily all the ſtories which their prieſts told them, and to pay the higheſt deference to the predictions of their ſoothſayers; but there were at that time, as in our days, ſome perſons of good ſenſe, who, ſo far from giving into thoſe extravagancies, were, on the contrary, bold enough to laugh at them publickly. Among theſe was the poet Ennius, who having occaſion to mention the ſoothſayers and pretended prophets of his time, treats them very bluntly. [a] He does not ſcruple to call them ſuperſtitious, impudent, madmen, and beggarly wretches. He tells us, that they are not able to guide themſelves, tho' they pretend to point out the way to others; and that at the ſame time that they promiſe riches, they beg a drachma from the very ſame perſons.

XXVIII. Of the Inchantment of the Indians.

WE are told in Exodus, that Pharaoh had magicians at his court, who had the art of counterfeiting the miracles which Moſes perform'd in preſence of that prince. But thoſe prodigies are now no more, ſo that we muſt no longer expect to meet with any thing like thoſe of the above-mention'd great prophet. And if any one ſhould happen to ſee ſuch miracles in our days, our opinion is, that ſuch perſons would do well not to publiſh them to the world. The truth is, ſtories of this kind are very much ſuſpected, particularly if they come from far, and are not ſtamp'd with thoſe characters which are inſeparable from true miracles [b]. Nevertheleſs as I am fully determin'd to take notice of the moſt minute circumſtances wherein I could obſerve any conformity between the Indians and the antients, I hope the reader will give me leave to make a few reflections on their conjurers.

Their inchantments, or at leaſt ſuch as I have had any knowledge of, have not very much in 'em, and extend no farther than in taking of adders, and making 'em dance to the muſic of a Flute. They have ſeveral kinds of adders, which they keep in baskets; theſe they carry from houſe to houſe, and make 'em dance, whenever any body will give 'em money: when any of theſe reptiles get into the houſes or gardens, they [c] get theſe Indians to drive 'em out; theſe have the art to bring them at their feet by the ſound of their flutes, and by ſinging certain ſongs; after which they take them up

[a] Superſtitioſi Vates, impudenteſque Harioli,
Aut inertes, aut inſani, quibus egeſtas imperat;
Qui ſibi ſemitam non ſapiunt, aliis monſtrant viam,
Quibus divitias pollicentur, ab his drachmas ipſi petunt.

[b] 'Tis probable that the reader may except thoſe miracles which are regularly perform'd every year: ſuch as, for inſtance, the liquifying blood of St. Januarius of Naples, &c. and the perpetual miracles, ſuch as the candle of Arras, which has burnt continually, in honour of the virgin Mary, for upwards of 800 years, without being at all diminiſh'd; the holy vial at Rheims, which never decreaſes in quantity; the periwig of the crucifix of Colen, the hair of which is never diminiſh'd, tho' the devotees are continually plucking ſome of it away.

[c] They alſo aſcribe to themſelves the power of charming tygers, and alligators or crocodiles, and to prevent their hurting any body. However, in ſpite of all theſe charms, theſe animals ſometimes devour people, and even in the ſacred river of Ganges. Mr. Fryar relates an inſtance to this purpoſe in his voyages, and adds at the ſame time, that the Bramins juſtified this accident, by ſaying, that the perſon who up by handfuls, without receiving the leaſt hurt; but they take great care not to kill them; and whenever they drive them out of a garden, they take them into the country along with them, and there keep them, in order to make them dance upon occaſion.

It happened in a place where I was, that an Indian ſeeing an adder, which washid in the guard-houſe, one of the ſoldiers kill'd it; this threw the pretended conjurer into a prodigious conſternation, when taking it up immediately, he went and interr'd it with great ceremony and veneration; he put a little rice and milk into the hole in which he had buried it, as it were to expiate the injury, which had been done to the whole progeny of adders.

The Egyptians, the Phœnicians, the Greeks and Romans uſed antiently to worſhip the [a] ſerpent. This animal, when ſtamp'd on money, and repreſented in painting, was an hieroglyphic of health and good fortune; when drawn with the tail in its mouth, 'twas an emblem of eternity, becauſe a circle has neither beginning or ending; and at the ſame time an emblem of the world, becauſe all men are, by the laws of nature, obliged to return from whence they came. 'Tis probable that Moſes, in order to oblige the Jews to addreſs themſelves to God, and to expect from him health, and the cure of their diſeaſes, which they wanted, might therefore have ſet up the brazen ſerpent, which in Egypt was the hieroglyphic of both.

'Twou'd be pretty difficult to aſſign any reaſon for this almoſt univerſal veneration, which ſo many people have had for ſerpents, thoſe frightful and noxious animals. 'Tis for this reaſon that the Negroes of Guinea ſtill continue to ſacrifice to the devil, to prevent his hurting them, and, if poſſible, to ſoften him by their ſubmiſſion and reſpect. 'Tis probable alſo that this worſhip might have been borrow'd from the ſtory of Adam, of Eve, and the ſerpent, to whom Moſes gives a voice in Geneſis, and which was known to other nations. Whatever might have been the view, or in whatever manner this worſhip may have been eſtabliſh'd, 'tis certain that it became very general, there being ſcarce any nation but what receiv'd it at one time or other.

I have heard ſome very ſurprizing particulars concerning theſe Indian conjurers; but as I gave but little credit to what I myſelf was not an eye-witneſs, I have not thought proper to be more diffuſive on the article of thoſe prodigies. I ſhall only add, that 'tis very probable ſuch kind of people were antiently the firſt, and the only enchanters; and that the hurt which the ſerpents or other creatures did them, might have given them occaſion, and made them deſirous of ſearching out proper means to deliver 'em from them. It has even been found, that Egypt, which abounded with reptiles more than any other country, was alſo the moſt fam'd for theſe ſort of cuſtoms.

I ſhall not take upon me to determine, whether this might have been perform'd by the aſſiſtance of the devil, or merely by ſome ſecrets of nature; for in what manner ſoever I might give my opinion, I ſhould be ſure to meet with a great number of oppoſers.

All I ſhall obſerve, is, that the name of Incantator, and that of [b] Epodos, which are ſynonimous terms, and which the antients gave to thoſe who perform'd ſurprizing prodigies, who had been devour'd could not have expiated his ſins any other way. The truth is, that theſe animals never ſeize upon any body unleſs they are hungry. As to ſerpents, 'tis very probable they may be delighted with muſical ſounds, and that the whole inchantment of the Bramins may center there. Baldeus, author of the deſcription of Coromandel in Dutch, relates, that he himſelf was an eye-witneſs to this conjuration with ſerpents. He adds, that when theſe Indians make any perſon take an oath, they oblige him to thruſt his hand into a pot, in which is a ſerpent. If he takes it out unhurt, he is judg'd to have ſwore the truth, but if it has been bit, he is look'd upon as forſworn. Let us not omit, that the Pſylli and the Theſſalians, &c. among the antients, pretended alſo to enchant ſerpents, and to handle them without receiving any hurt.

[a] Eſculapius was worſhipp'd under that ſhape at Epidaurus, and continued under it when he left that city to go to Rome. The inhabitants of Meſopotamia uſed formerly to worſhip ſerpents, undoubtedly in order to prevent their hurting 'em. But then on the other ſide, ſerpents did not ſhew the leaſt complaiſance to ſuch ſtrangers as came to ſettle in the country. The Genii were alſo worſhipp'd under the ſhape of ſerpents. We alſo aſcribe to theſe antient practices, the Taliſmans, repreſented by ſerpents.

prodigies, pretty nearly juſtify the ſuppoſition I made with regard to the firſt inchanters; both of 'em ſignifying a man who ſings on ſomething, or becauſe of ſomething, as the Indians do when they are deſirous of charming adders, or about making 'em dance.

The Jews, who lived many years among the Egyptians, borrow'd from them the impoſtures or juggling tricks which are ſo often mention'd in ſcripture: but whether or no they made uſe of them, 'tis certain they were acquainted with 'em, and knew in what manner they were practis'd by other nations: for [a] David compares the fury of the wicked to that of a ſerpent; or to that of an adder, which will not liſten to the voice of the charmer, charm he never ſo wiſely.

'Tis alſo certain, that ſome perſons have in all ages been fam'd for the power they had over reptiles, and that writers have mention'd certain people who either drew ſerpents to them, or kill'd them by the power of their ſong. Virgil, ſpeaking of the virtues of poeſy, which was the ordinary language of ſoothſayers and enchanters, whence it is that the name of Vates is indifferently given to both; tells us, that it has the power of drawing down the moon from heaven: that Circe, by the ſinging of certain verſes, chang'd the companions of Ulyſſes into ſwine; and that they, by the ſame power, uſed to kill adders in the [b] meadows. [c] Ovid ſpeaks to the ſame purpoſe in his Amorum. [d] Silius Italicus alſo relates the ſame thing, ſpeaking of the Marmarides, a people of Africa, whoſe power he admires, ſaying, that they by their ſongs had the art of charming the venom of the ſerpent. In fine, all the antients have agreed, that ſome people have perform'd very ſurprizing things by the help of certain verſes or words. According to [e] Ovid, ſome had even the power to deſtroy the harveſt, to dry up ſprings, to make the fruit fall from the trees, and that only by repeating a few verſes, or by ſinging certain ſongs.

XXIX. Of the Bramins.

AS we have already taken notice of the antient Brachmans, we believe our ſelves indiſpenſibly oblig'd to be a little more diffuſive on that head; and to make ſome mention of the ſucceſſors of thoſe Indians, ſo famous in antiquity, whom people uſed antiently to go to hear, with at leaſt as much eagerneſs, as the queen of Sheba went to hear the wiſdom of Solomon.

[f] St. Jerom writing to St. Paulinus, and telling him of thoſe learned men, who from a thirſt after knowledge had travelled over ſeveral countries, and gone to the extremities of the earth, in ſearch of famous perſons, to improve by their wiſdom and knowledge; relates, that the celebrated Apollonius went quite thro' the country of the Scythians and Maſſagetes; croſs'd the renown'd river Piſon, which is the Ganges; and arriv'd arriv'd at laſt among the Brachmans. 'Twas there the learned Hiarchas ſitting on his golden throne, inſtructed ſome choſen diſciples in the ſecrets of nature, the motions of the ſtars, and the revolution of years.

[f] Why ſhould St. Jerom have been quoted on this occaſion, ſince he had better have cited Philoſtratus, who writ the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, of whom mention is made in this place?

As to the golden throne, the reader will give us leave to obſerve once more, that it is ſurprizing St. Jerom ſhould expatiate ſo much on the prodigious quantity of Gold that is found about the Ganges, and towards the coaſt of Coromandel; that Quintus Curtius ſhould relate much more of thoſe countries which are water'd by the river Indus; and that there ſhould be ſo little in our days, in compariſon of what was ſaid to be anciently: the greateſt riches of the Indies, reckoning from the Ganges to the Perſian gulph, conſiſting in the diamond mines of the kingdom of Golconda. They have no ſilver but what is brought by foreigners, and the greateſt part of their gold comes from the iſland of Sumatra, or even from China, Japan, &c.

But to trace matters a little higher, with regard to Apollonius; we ſhall obſerve with ſome authors, that he, after having paſs'd the river Indus, enter'd into the country which was formerly govern'd by the famous Porus, whom Alexander the Great conquer'd; and that he went to the capital city call'd Taxilis, which ſome, tho' without any manner of foundation, have taken for Cambaia, a city of Guzurat. This kingdom was at that time govern'd by Pharaates, a very affable prince, and very dear to his ſubjects; and indeed he relied entirely on their fidelity and love, ſo that he never had any guards about his perſon. He avoided that pomp and grandeur which are made inſeparable from a magnificent and numerous train; and his court, tho' a very pretty one, boaſted nothing more than a beautiful ſimplicity. Near his palace ſtood a ſplendid temple which was dedicated to the ſun, and 'twas this pompous edifice firſt ſtruck the eye of the admiring ſpectator. Every thing there was in the utmoſt order. A foreigner would not have miſtaken the king's palace for the houſe of a God, nor a temple for the habitation of a mortal; their temples having all the magnificence ſuitable to the habitation of a God, and their palaces all the ſimplicity ſuitable to creatures who live in a ſtate of dependance.

Apollonius, after ſome days ſtay at the court of king Pharaates, went towards the river Hyſpaſis, near which he found a monument rais'd by Alexander the Great, on which the following inſcription in the Greek tongue was engrav'd.

A MONUMENT
SACRED TO MY FATHER AMMON;
TO MY BROTHER
HERCULES; TO MINERVA; TO JUPITER
OLYMPIUS; TO THE CABIRI OF SAMOTHRACIA; TO THE INDIAN SUN; TO APOLLO OF DELPHOS.

He croſs'd the river, and after having travell'd four days, arriv'd at the city of the wiſe-men, where Hiarchas, of whom mention has been already made, preſided. He here convers'd with the Bramins on the tranſmigration of ſouls, and afterwards on the formation of the world.

These learned Indians admitted five elements, whence, they said, all things owe their original. The first element, according to them, was a kind of æthereal substance, but very thin and subtil. 'Tis of this, they pretend, those Beings were form'd, to whom they gave the name of Gods and heavenly Genii. This doctrine has a great conformity to the theology of the Chineze Literati, if it be true, as several assure it is, that they are Atheists in their hearts; and hold that the soul, after death, will dissolve into an æthereal substance. In a word, this, properly speaking, would be the very philosophy of the celebrated Phoë, whom we have already mention'd in the chapter of the transmigration of souls. As to the four other elements, they allow'd 'em to be fire, air, water and earth, and imagin'd that all corruptible creatures were compos'd of the mixture of 'em all.

I shall not spend any time in making random reflections on the etymology of the name of the Brachmans, who are at this day call'd Bramins. Some are for making them the posterity of Abraham, so that, according to these, Bramins, is as much as to say, Abrahamites. Neither shall I take any notice of the three Magi or Wise-men, who came from the East into Judea, to worship our Saviour, and whom some writers [a] pretend to have been Brachmans. All these conjectures are founded only on the affinities between certain words, or on some resemblance in the manners, but are far from satisfying the understanding. A man who is desirous of arguing justly, and of drawing such consequences only as are true, is indispensably oblig'd to lay down good principles, and to employ more solid proofs: so that, without examining whence the Bramins are descended, and what was their original, I shall go no further than to compare the Bramins of antient times with those of our days; at least as far as I was able to dive into that matter.

[b] The modern Bramins have preserv'd some noble fragments of the knowledge of the antient Brachmans. They are skilful arithmeticians, and calculate the eclipses of the sun and moon as exactly as the best mathematicians in Europe. They work the most difficult questions in arithmetic, without either pen or pencil, and that with a surprizing facility. They have moreover several treatises of morality, and some others containing the fabulous histories of their Gods. Their study extends no farther than this, for as to chronology they are utterly ignorant of it. Even an age with them is of such remote antiquity, that 'tis impossible for 'em to trace it. All their books which treat of past ages, are only a mixture of stories relating to their Deities and antient kings, in which there is not one fix'd Æra. But to speak the truth, the Bramins of our days imitate exactly the most learned men of all nations of antiquity, who, unhappily for history, neglected the study of chronology, not considering what a confusion it would be to posterity.

The Chaldeans apply'd themselves wholly to the study of the stars, and the interpretation of dreams. The overflowing of the Nile in Egypt first gave rise to geometry. The Assyrians and Persians studied nature, and her secrets. The Greeks wrote but little at first, or only as inclination dictated. They seldom wrote on any subject but the [b] To give the reader an idea of this conformity, let us see what the antients have written concerning the Brachmans. They tell us, that they first profess'd themselves to be followers of the tenets and instructions of Pythagoras. They were very much addicted to magic. They lay on the ground, and lived only on herbs. They worshipp'd the sun, and were very careful of keeping in those fires which were lighted with his rays. They made a thousand prayers, and observ'd a thousand ceremonies to procure its favour. They used to wash themselves in the clear stream, &c. There is very little, or rather no difference, between these customs of the antient Brachmans and those of the modern Bramins. The latter are as great sticklers for the transmigration of souls; they are look'd upon as inchanters, lie on the ground, live only on herbs; they wash themselves with the utmost care, take water and throw it up towards the sun, as an homage that is due to him. The antient Brachmans were divided into two orders or classes, one of which were the Brachmans, properly so call'd, and the other the Gymnosophists. Such among the Bramins as have the greatest conformity to those antient Gymnosophists are the Jauguis; a sect who are but one remove from savages, and who, like the Gymnosophists of old, observe a prodigious severe discipline, and at the same time are equally proud and hypocritical.

[a] Jo. Jac. Boissard.

the amorous intrigues of their Deities, the better to excite them to their pleaſures. If we except ſome pieces of morality, or ſome maxims or perſuaſives to a virtuous and happy life, ſuch as Heſiod has given us; who yet treats in the greateſt part of his works, of the genealogy of the Gods, which muſt conſequently be a confus'd medley of all kinds of fictions; nothing remarkable concerning thoſe antient times has been tranſmitted to us, which yet are the beſt and the moſt authentic pieces with regard to the origin of Greece: beſides, what little we have is wholly grounded upon conjecture, which poſſibly might have been ſupported only by ſome antient monuments.

When men, after the revolution of ſeveral ages, had begun to apply themſelves ſeriouſly to hiſtory, they found it neceſſary for them either to omit a great many particulars, or to invent and draw, as it were, a ſeries of chronology out of their own imaginations; there being almoſt as many opinions with regard to the firſt ages of the world, as there are hiſtorians. Thus poſterity would be at as great a loſs with reſpect to our times, were all other nations as negligent in this caſe as the Indians are. The chief, or rather the only college the Bramins have, is at Benares, a city ſeated on the Ganges.

I have already obſerv'd, that the Indians are very credulous with regard to their Taliſmans, and that they ſtudy very diligently the hidden properties of the heavenly bodies, of figures and numbers. The Bramins, who are ſtill conſider'd as men of great learning and experience, are the depoſitaries of theſe pretended myſteries, for the common people don't trouble their heads about them. We are told that the antient Brachmans had great skill in the occult ſciences; and indeed all ſuch as apply'd themſelves to the ſtudy of theſe dark, and, as we may ſay, enigmatical ſciences, went to the Indies to learn of the Brachmans, and to dive into the ſecrets of natural magic in all their purity and in the whole compaſs of them. Such, for inſtance, were the combinations of certain numbers, or of certain letters; and ſome odd groteſque figures, by whoſe aſſiſtance they imagin'd they ſhould be able to pry into futurity.

'Tis pretended that the [a] Cabala have borrow'd a great part of their idle fancies from the philoſophy of Foe, of whom mention has been made in the chapter of the tranſmigration of ſouls. We alſo meet in this rhapſody of Rabbiniſm and Magic, ſomething that bears a great affinity to the doctrine of the Chineze Literati, concerning heaven and the æthereal ſubſtance, into which, Foe ſaid, the ſoul diſſolv'd itſelf after its ſeparation from the body. The notions which this Indian philoſopher had form'd concerning the diſſolving of the ſoul into air, of whoſe ſubſtance, according to him, they were a part; are not more extraordinary than thoſe which the members of the Cabala have of the ſubſtance of which heaven was made. They imagine that this matter is animated, and that the queen of heaven, regina cæli, of whom mention is made in the xlivth chapter of the prophet Jeremiah, is the ſoul of that material heaven which we ſee when we look upwards. 'Tis alſo thought that the Cabala has borrow'd ſeveral things from Plato's philoſophy, which is only a ſequel of that of [b] Foe.

If we were to form a judgment of the pretended magic and occult knowledge of all the Indians in general, from that of an old Bramin, whom I have ſeen at Pondichery, I ſhould not have a very great opinion of it. This perſon, who was look'd upon as one of the moſt learned, and at the ſame time one of the moſt formidable men in the country, becauſe of the great miſchief which they ſaid he was able to do by his art, came ſeveral times to ſee me. He promis'd to ſhew me ſeveral ſurprizing things, and to inſtruct me in ſome wonderful ſecrets; telling me at the ſame time, that he muſt kill a cock for that purpoſe, but that he was oblig'd to perform the ſacrifices privately. For,

[a] Cabala, ſignifies a ſecret expoſition of the divine law given by the mouth of God to Moſes, and by him reveal'd to the Jews. The ſecret theology of the ſcriptures, to which ſome Jews adhere. The myſtical interpretation of the words of the ſcripture by a certain calculation, and by the tranſpoſition of letters.

[b] We are not to call it a ſequel, in being impoſſible that Plato ſhould have borrow'd any thing from Foe, ſince he liv'd after him.

For, as I have elſewhere obſerv'd, they were forbid to offer bloody ſacrifices to their Gods. I was nevertheleſs firmly reſolv'd to ſtop him, in caſe I had found him reſolv'd to have recourſe to invocations, or had perceiv'd that nature no longer bore a part in what he was going about. All I deſir'd, was to ſee how far he might rely upon his art, and whether the prelude to his work might bear any affinity to that of the antient heathens. But he ſpar'd me that trouble; for whether it were that he perceiv'd I did not give credit to all he told me concerning his inchantments, or that he only had the reputation of a very skilful man, without being ſo in reality; I could never prevail with him to bring his matters to a concluſion, but always found him trumping up a thouſand excuſes. For he ſometimes would ſay the time was improper, at other times he could not meet with a cock for his purpoſe, and ſuch an one as was proper for the ſacrifice. In a word, there was always ſome remora in his way. Perhaps 'twas becauſe he would not debaſe his exalted knowledge ſo far, as to communicate it to a profane wretch, who was not initiated in the myſteries of the Bramins. In fine, he went no farther, but contented himſelf with having made me thoſe great promiſes, all which confirm'd me in my firſt opinion, and the notion I had ever entertain'd with regard to thoſe idle conceits.

XXX. Of the Averſion the Indians have to Wine.

I Know not to what we can aſcribe the averſion which the Indians have to all ſorts of wine: we cannot ſay they borrow'd it from the Mahometans, ſince it is not many years ſince their religion has prevail'd in the Indies; not to mention that 'tis manifeſt the Indians abſtain'd from wine long before Mahomet, who did not begin to promulgate his doctrine till the beginning of the ſeventh century.

We dare not on this occaſion trace ſo far backwards as the deluge, or pretend to ſay that in thoſe early ages, ſome men being deſirous of imitating the Antediluvians, and who for want of knowing the uſe of wine had never drank any, abſtain'd altogether from that liquor: Probably the indecent poſture into which it threw Noah, might be the reaſon of their abſtaining from it; but this would be to ſuppoſe a thing, for which we have no manner of authority; not to mention that this hypotheſis would interfere with the teſtimonies of ſome authors we ſhall now cite.

I believe the moſt probable reaſon that could be given on that head, is the virtue of ſome antient Brachmans. 'Tis manifeſt that they had the ſtrongeſt averſion to every thing that might any way contribute to the plunging them into irregularities, or diſordering their ſenſes. This it was that made them conſider that liquor as very pernicious, which was capable of extinguiſhing a man's reaſon, that is to ſay, his moſt valuable Faculty [a]. In fine, they found themſelves oblig'd to inſpire the people whom they govern'd with theſe ſentiments.

The Jews and Nazarenes abſtain'd alſo from wine; not only thoſe who were born ſuch, as Samſon and St. John Baptiſt, but even all ſuch as made a vow to follow the laws of the Nazarites for a certain term of years, were oblig'd to abſtain from wine, from every intoxicating liquor, and from grapes. 'Tis thus we find it enjoin'd in the book of [b] Numbers: We have likewiſe in ſcripture the example of the Rechabites, the poſterity of Jonadab the ſon of Rechab, who abſtain'd from all kinds of wine.

[a] Theſe cuſtoms owe their original either to uſe or neceſſity; wine and all ſtrong liquors in general are pernicious in hot countries, becauſe of their waſting the ſpirits ſo much. Experience taught them that the abſtaining from theſe liquors would be uſeful, and people of judgment, ſuch as the antient Brachmans, &c. thought it would be neceſſary, in order to gain the love of the people, and to make the greater merit of their abſtinence, to eſtabliſh it as an article of their religion, and inculcate it as ſuch.

wine. We know that the Mahometans don't drink this liquor; but then as for grapes, they make no ſcruple of eating 'em.

We cannot ſay that the Indians abſtain from wine, becauſe they have none to drink; for I am perſuaded they might have had it among 'em, ſince the vines which the Europeans plant in thoſe countries thrive well enough: I myſelf have eat very good grapes there; and have been aſſur'd that there are a great many vines about Golconda, which is not very far up in the country.

The Bramins drink a great quantity of melted butter, and I have even been aſſur'd that it makes them run into the moſt extravagant exceſſes, and that this butter gets up into their heads, and ſuddles them. This appears very extraordinary, and I ſhould have been glad to have ſeen an experiment of it, had it been poſſible; but they take their meaſures ſo artfully, and do every thing with ſo much ſecrecy, that it is impoſſible to come upon them at unawares.

The Romans had always the uſe of wine among them; in the infancy of the republic women were prohibited from drinking it, for fear, as [a] Valerius Maximus relates, of its prompting them to indulge in ſome irregularity. They were ſo very exact and rigorous in the having this law punctually obſerv'd, that Egnatius Meceninus being inform'd that his wife had drank wine, he kill'd her, and was not puniſh'd for it [b]. This happen'd under the Reign of Romulus. Such a ſeverity was owing to the jealouſy of husbands, who thought that a woman in liquor is uncapable of defending her heart, and reſiſting the attacks of her gallants, in which they were certainly in the right. Ovid, who had a perfect taſte of gallantry, knew very well that wine is apt to inſpire luſt; but he ſeems to preſcribe a remedy againſt the paſſion of love, which is almoſt as pernicious as the diſeaſe he pretends to cure; and that is [c], drinking wine to exceſs.

The Egyptian prieſts continued a long time without the uſe of wine, and as their kings were prieſts, they were obliged to obſerve the ſame abſtinence. It has been obſerv'd that Pſammetichus was the firſt Egyptian king that ever drank any, which was about 640 Years before Chriſt; in which he probably might have imitated the Syrians, among whom he had taken refuge, at the time that Sabachus king of Ethiopia enter'd Egypt. But notwithſtanding this liquor was drunk under his reign, and that of his ſucceſſors, they nevertheleſs drank it but moderately, and they had even laws, which ſettled the quantity of wine their kings and prieſts were to drink. The Egyptians not only abſtain'd from wine before the reign of this prince, but they did not even dare to preſent any in the ſacrifices of the Gods, as was the cuſtom in ſeveral other nations; becauſe the abovemention'd people imagin'd that this liquor was hated by the Gods, and that it ow'd its original to the blood of thoſe wicked men, who had formerly rebell'd againſt heaven. This is quoted from Plutarch, who himſelf had borrow'd it from Hecatæus: The verſion of the Latin tranſlator may be ſeen in the following note [d].

I have already ſaid that 'tis certain the Indians don't drink wine, and that the Bramins eſpecially have the utmoſt averſion to that liquor. Notwithſtanding which, I have read the very reverſe in [e] Athenæus, who tells us from Chares Mitylenæus, that the Indians dians were great drinkers. 'Tis upon occaſion of a drinking match, which Alexander eſtabliſh'd among the Indians after the death of Calanus, one of the wiſe men of the city of Taxilis or Taxila; and who follow'd that prince into Perſia, where he burnt himſelf in publick, and with great pomp, purely to free himſelf from the inconveniences of old age, which was beginning to ſteal upon him.

[e] Athenæus Deipnoſophiſta, lib. 10. Here follows the very words of the Tranſlator of Athenæus. *Chares Mitylenæus in ſuis de Alexandro hiſtoriis, cum de Calano Indo Philoſopho narreſſet, illum in accenſum regum ſe projeciſſe & ita obiiſſe, refert Alexandrum ad ejus tumulum Gymnicos ludos edidiſſe, ac muſicos, & qua laudaretur funebrem orationem haberi præcipiſſe: tum etiam, quoniam Indi bibaces erant, meræ potionis certamen propoſuiſſe, cujus præmium eſſet primario victori talentum. dians

We don't meet with the ſtory of Calanus in Quintus Curtius, 'tis only in the [a] ſupplement to it; but there is no mention made of thoſe famous drinkers, nor of the prize which Alexander gave to the victor, which I very much wonder at. Such an incident was remarkable enough to merit a place among a numberleſs multitude of other circumſtances, which that author relates of his hero, and which are not half ſo ſurprizing as that juſt mention'd: He nevertheleſs tells us in one place, that all the Indians had a great love for wine, and that they [b] drank vaſt quantities of it; this is where he ſpeaks of thoſe concubines, who uſed to fill the wine to the Indian king, and always carried him to bed after he had drank heartily. I am alſo ſurpriz'd that Arrian, who has given us a pretty long detail of the death of Calanus, does not mention a word of that celebrated drinking bout, when the conqueror drank four congii of wine, which makes one hundred ninety-two pints; and indeed he died a few days after his victory.

I muſt own I don't know how to reconcile theſe two paſſages of Quintus Curtius and Athenæus with the way of life which the modern Indians lead. If that of Quintus Curtius was in leſs general terms, we might alledge, that ſome of thoſe who border'd upon Perſia were given to drinking wine, for the Perſians were great drinkers; but this author tells us expreſſly, that all the Indians in general were addicted to that vice——Vinum——cujus omnibus Indis largus eſt uſus, as I have juſt now obſerv'd. This ſurprizes me ſo much the more, as they even at that time follow'd the maxims of the celebrated Foe, which prevails among them to this day; and that the Brachmans, who govern'd them at that time, were look'd upon as the moſt virtuous, as well as moſt learned men upon earth. I therefore cannot poſſibly comprehend how they could give a ſanction to ſuch irregularities: What made Alexander kill ſo many men with drinking, and that too in order to celebrate the funeral obſequies of ſo virtuous and abſtemious a man as Calanus is repreſented? What made that monarch employ fools, in the honours which he paid to the memory of ſo wiſe a man? The inference that might be drawn from what has been obſerv'd, is, that if thoſe people were really antiently what thoſe two authors have repreſented them to be, they muſt be greatly chang'd ſince that time; ſince from great drinkers they are become very ſober men and have wine in the utmoſt abhorrence.

The reader may probably ask when that change happen'd, for ſo remarkable an Æra would very well merit obſervation; but this I believe is a queſtion that no body could anſwer, becauſe the averſion which the Indians have for wine ſeems to be innate as it were; and that, as has been already obſerv'd, one can ſcarce think it could ever have been poſſible for them to live in a different manner from what they do now. Beſides, if ſuch a change did really ever happen, it muſt abſolutely have been introduc'd by ſome famous legiſlator, who reign'd over all India with a deſpotick ſway. We don't hear of one ſingle perſon of that character in the Indies, ever ſince the time of Alexander the Great: But I am ſenſible, that at the ſame time I am alledging theſe reaſons, in order to inſinuate that the Indians were never great drinkers, or at leaſt to ſtart difficulties againſt this opinion, I expoſe myſelf to the being reproach'd with having publickly oppos'd the teſtimony of Chares of Mitylene, and that of Quintus Curtius. I muſt confeſs that I can ſcarce give credit to all the Particulars he relates concerning the Indians, and if I do not wholly reject every thing they have advanced upon that head, head, I cannot at leaſt forbear ſaying, that my opinion is, that this paſſage in Quintus Curtius is writ in too general terms; and that the vice with which he reproaches them, was confin'd only to certain particular parts of India, which, as I juſt now obſerv'd, might probably have been thoſe that lay contiguous to Perſia. We are even to obſerve, that all the time Alexander continued in the Indies, he remov'd but at a very little diſtance from the rivers of Indus and Hydaſpis; and that conſequently he might, without any great difficulty, have procur'd the wines of Perſia; and among the reſt, that of Shyras, which is not far from that country: This wine is famous all over India, and is that which is moſt commonly drank there. They freight a great number of veſſels with this liquor, and carry it to all thoſe places where the Europeans are ſettled.

[a] Quint. Curt. lib. 10.

XXXI. Of their Traffic and Inſincerity.

THE Indians apply themſelves very much to traffic, in which they ſucceed tolerably well; but a man muſt be upon his guard when he has any dealings with them, for they never fail to over-reach, whenever they meet with an opportunity for ſo doing. How unreaſonable ſoever they may be in their bargaining for any thing, and tho' they ask double the value of a thing, they yet do it with ſo much coolneſs and gravity, as often puzzles an European. 'Twould be to no purpoſe to be angry with them, for they never fail to anſwer only in the moſt obliging terms; and while the buyer is railing at them, they liſten with the utmoſt patience and attention, and don't let drop one diſobliging word. On the other ſide, was a man to offer them but a teſter for a thing that was worth ten piſtoles, they would not be at all diſobliged at it, nor would make an angry comment on the unreaſonable offer that had been made them. But they are always ſure to get their ends; they chuſe rather to deal with haſty people, than with ſuch as have a great deal of phlegm; for theſe they ſay they cannot ſo eaſily bring into their meaſures as the former, in which they are certainly in the right.

They are alſo great uſurers, particularly when they have to do with foreigners: perhaps this might have been one of the articles of their religion, or at leaſt a thing that was lawful, which ſeems to have been formerly the caſe among the [a] Jews. Be that as it will, 'tis certain the [b] Indians have carried it to as great an exceſs as ever the Jews did.

XXXII. The Idea the Indians have of the Arts, and the Knowledge the Antients had of Silk.

THE Indians eſteem the ſeveral arts, in proportion to their immediate uſefulneſs in common life, ſo that among them, the profeſſion of a [c] ploughman, and that of a ſhepherd, are placed in the firſt rank, while that of the goldſmith is look'd upon as the meaneſt and moſt contemptible of all arts.

They have very little notion of ſculpture and deſigning, but their skill in manufacturing ſilks and cottons is known to all, and they have been renown'd for many ages for their skill in theſe works. Father

[a] Deuter. xxiii. 19, 20. Non fœnerabis fratri tuo ad uſuram pecuniam nec fruges, nec quamlibet aliam rem, ſed alieno. Fratri autem tuo, abſque uſura id quo indiget commodabis. But we are not therefore to imagine from thence, that God gives a ſanction to the taking of exorbitant intereſt.

[b] See the Travels of Tavernier, Chardin, Bernier, &c. upon this article.

[c] In this they agree with the idea our forefathers had of husbandry, which juſtly deſerves to be conſider'd as ſuperior to ſuch arts as are leſs neceſſary to the world.

[a] Father Petau relates, after ſeveral other authors, that about the twenty-fifth year of Juſtinian, that is, about anno Dom. 552. certain monks brought ſome ſilk-worms eggs from the Indies to Conſtantinople, and taught the manner of manufacturing it.

This learned chronologer, and all thoſe writers who have mentioned the ſame circumſtance, means no more by it than this, viz. that no ſilk had been made in the empire of the Eaſt till Juſtinian's time, but not that it was not uſed there till that period, for it was known in theſe parts long before the reign of that emperor.

As for inſtance, [b] Ezekiel, when he is deploring the miſerable ſtate to which the famous city of Tyre ſhould be reduc'd, after having related every circumſtance which contributed to its grandeur, adds, that it traded with the Syrians, and that among other things it drew ſilk from their country. The Syrians might eaſily have got this commodity from India, by going down into the gulph of Balſora by the river Euphrates.

The Perſians uſed antiently to wear ſilk, which among them was a token of dignity. We are not to omit, that among the ſeveral honours which Aſſuerus paid [c] Mordecai, that of giving him a ſilken garment was one.

We are therefore not to imagine that the diſtance which lay between the nations bordering on Paleſtine and the Indies, prevented their trading with each other. The author of the book of Job was not ignorant of the manner of working in painted callicoes, and generally in all kinds of dyes in India: for when he is for ſhewing that wiſdom is ſuperior to all worldly poſſeſſions, how valuable ſoever they may be; he goes on with ſaying, that the [d] Indian dyes are not to be compared to it. It may perhaps be objected, that what the antients call'd Sericum is not the ſame with our ſilk; and conſequently, that the monks who return'd from the Indies to Conſtantinople, not only taught the manner of manufacturing it, but were alſo the firſt who brought any from thence; and that before their time, there was not any ſilk uſed like that of the moderns. Several authors are likewiſe of this opinion, and pretend that there was a great difference between the Sericum of the [e] antients and the ſilk of our days: but I don't find that their opinion is ſupported by any ſolid reaſon, ſince it is founded only on what ſome have told us concerning the manner in which Sericum was formerly made, which has no manner of affinity with the modern manner of drawing ſilk: ſo that in my opinion, this does no way prove their being different from one another. 'Tis highly probable, that the Jews, the Greeks, and Romans, had the ſame ſilk that is uſed in our days, and that the reaſon of their aſcribing it to another original, was owing to their ignorance of the way of manufacturing it, and whence it came; they living at ſo great a diſtance from the place where it was wrought.

Several, for inſtance, fancied that it was taken from the bark of a tree, after which it was comb'd and ſpun, as we find in [f] Strabo and [g] Pauſanias. Pliny and ſeveral other antient writers relate, that it was made of a kind of wool, which came from the trees in India. This at firſt ſeems to have been advanc'd at random and without the leaſt probability; however, if we will but give our ſelves the trouble to ſearch into the bottom of it, we ſhall perhaps find that Pliny and thoſe who followed his opinion, have

[d] Job. xxviii. 16. Non conferetur tinctis Indiæ coloribus, according to the vulgar tranſlation of the bible, but 'tis in the original fine gold of Ophir.

[e] 'Tis certain, that ſilk was known to the antients ſeveral centuries before Juſtinian; but as men had not the art of making their advantage of the labours of the ſilk-worm, it was much ſcarcer at that time than it became afterwards, and particularly within theſe 250 years. As for inſtance, all the modern manufactures of ſilk-ſtuffs were entirely unknown to the Greeks and Romans. They however had ſtuffs made of ſilk and wool, tho' we don't meet with any thing among them that anſwers truly to our Damask, which originally came from Damaſcus; to our ſhorn or bare cloath without wool, which came firſt from Morocco; to the Armuſins, that came from Ormuz, &c. Be that as it will, 'tis plain that ſilk was known formerly, from ſeveral paſſages in the antients; and the only conſequence that can be drawn from what may be ſaid to the contrary, is, that it was very ſcarce and extremely dear in thoſe ages.

have not been quite ſo miſtaken as people have imagin'd, or at leaſt that they did not advance their aſſertions without ſome foundation. 'Tis very probable, that before mankind underſtood the method of feeding ſilk-worms, and of making them work, there might be great numbers of them in the woods; that they made choice of thoſe trees whoſe leaves were moſt tender, and ſpun their ſilk round the little branches, as the caterpillars (which are very like ſilk-worms) do in our days. Men finding theſe little knots or cluſters of worms, which were almoſt in the ſhape of a bean, upon trees; imagin'd that thoſe kind of trees produc'd both of them naturally, and that this was the only original of theſe bottoms. This opinion, tho' a falſe one, had at leaſt ſome foundation, and is much more feaſible than that which aſcribes the origin of ſilk to the barks of trees.

[a] Ovid ſpeaks in his Metamorphoſes of certain worms that uſed to work threads about the branches of trees, which afterwards were chang'd into butterflies.

The poet may poſſibly mean caterpillars, which weave a kind of ſilk, and are afterwards chang'd into butterflies. Probably alſo he might ſpeak of ſilk-worms, which in thoſe days uſed to be diſpers'd up and down the woods, as the caterpillars at this day. The reaſon which we may aſſign for their not taking any care of them, was becauſe they were not of any manner of uſe. It may be objected, that the threads mention'd by Ovid were white, canis filis, which does not ſeem to agree with the ſilk which our ſilk-worms generally produce, it being generally yellow; but I believe we might anſwer, that the dew, and the open air in which they lived, might have given them that colour. However, I would not inſiſt upon this as fact, and propoſe it only as a conjecture.

Moſt authors are agreed upon the etymology of the word Sericum, which they derive from a people call'd [b] Seres; but as ſeveral nations have been call'd by that name, it would be a very difficult matter to know exactly from which of all thoſe, Silk might have borrow'd its name.

There was a nation which inhabited the higher Ethiopia, towards the ſource of the Nile, who were call'd [c] Seres. Another inhabited thoſe parts that lie between the Ganges, Hydaſpes and Indus, which at this time make a part of the dominions of the Great Mogul, and part of thoſe of the Sophy of Perſia. In fine, the third people of this name liv'd to the north of China, and their [d] country had the eaſtern ocean to the eaſt; Scythia to the weſt; that which compoſes the kingdoms of Tangut and Niuche, are a part of Great Tartary. The name of the capital city was Iſſedon-Serica, which many believe to be the ſame with that which in our days is call'd [e] Suchur.

If we were abſolutely reſolv'd to ſearch for the etymology of the word Sericum in the name of one of thoſe three nations, I believe the ſureſt way would be to take it from that which lay between the Ganges, the Hydaſpes, and Indus; as that country is very fruitful in ſilk, and that a trade might have been eaſily carried on between that country and Paleſtine, by the Perſian gulph and the Euphrates. But without going ſo far for an etymology, I am of opinion, that we may juſtly deduce the word Sericum from the Syrians, who, as was juſt before obſerv'd, traded for ſilk with the merchants of the city of Tyre, which they afterwards ſpread over all Paleſtine. Be that as it will, moſt of the eaſtern nations have agreed in the name which they have given to ſilk. The Hebrews

Fatali mutant cum papilione figuram.

[b] The Chineze are thought to have been the Seres, which opinion is not altogether without ſome foundation. The empire of China produces a prodigious quantity of ſilk, and 'tis manifeſt from the annals of China, that it was wrought there eight hundred years before our Saviour.

[e] 'Tis a city in the province of Tanguth.

Hebrews call'd it Sericot, the Syrians Seriaca, the Greeks call'd a ſilk ſuit of clothes Sericos. Some authors have pretended that the word Sericos came from the Arabic Sarac, which ſignifies, to be ſhining.

XXXIII. The Indian Manner of Writing, and the Subſtance they uſe inſtead of Paper.

THE Indians write upon the leaf of a tree, which is call'd Latanier. 'Tis a kind of palm-tree, the leaves of which are not ſo long as thoſe of the common palm-tree, but are very thick and ſtrong. They write with a bodkin. Some, as ſoon as they have form'd the letters, black the leaf all over, and thus fill up the letters; but the greateſt part go no further than tracing out the letters as above. Theſe leaves require no great preparation; they have no more to do than to dry 'em, and to ſeparate them from one another, they being made like a fan. When thoroughly dry'd, they are of a ſtraw colour, but time gives them a very brown hue.

The antients have mention'd thoſe leaves which the Indians made uſe of for writing, and call'd the tree that bears them Talos. 'Tis probable they had miſtaken the word Talos for Latos, and there is no great difference between Latos and Latanier. 'Tis true indeed, that this word has not an Indian termination, but as it was brought from far, we may ſuppoſe that they thought proper to dreſs it after the Greek mode, and make it end in os. Perhaps alſo, that the Greeks, to whom it was known, gave it ſuch a termination, as was adapted to the genius of their language. Nevertheleſs, 'tis plain from the deſcription they have given of that tree, that they were not at all acquainted with it: for they tell us, that its leaves were ſix cubits long, in which they were greatly miſtaken; for the leaves of the Latanier are ſeldom two cubits long. But 'tis very probable that they may have taken the Bananier for the Latanier. The leaves of the former are often ten, nay even twelve foot long, but then they are ſo thin, that the ſmalleſt puff of wind tears them to pieces, ſo that it would be impoſſible to write upon them.

We may naturally ſuppoſe, that writing in its infancy was not ſo common as it became afterwards; and indeed it was not employ'd in every trifling particular, but only in ſuch works as deſerv'd to be tranſmitted to lateſt poſterity.

Writing was therefore ſeldom uſed, and whenever it was employ'd, 'twas for [a] ages. We may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that ſtones were firſt uſed for tranſmitting events to future ages. We are told that Enoch engrav'd the ſtory of the creation of the univerſe upon two obelisks. The firſt and ſecond tables, on which the commandments of the law were writ, and which God gave to his people by the hand of Moſes, were of the ſame matter. Joſhua, after having taken the city of Ai, [b] writ all Deuteronomy and a copy of the law round a ſtone altar which he built to the Lord. We are not to wonder that he writ all Deuteronomy in ſo ſmall a compaſs. 'Tis well known that it contains thirty-four long chapters, and as the ſtones were not ſmooth, no iron tool having been upon them, the letters muſt neceſſarily have been larger than they wou'd otherwiſe have been: but then we are to conſider, that they commonly made uſe of abbreviations in their writing, even generally in [c] hieroglyphics. 'Tis in this manner that all Homer's Iliads were written [a] Zeuxis being ask'd why he painted ſo exceeding ſlow, reply'd, Pingo æternitati, i. e. I paint for the lateſt poſterity.

[b] Joſ. viii. 32. Et ſcripſit ſuper lapides Deuteronomium, &c.

[c] There is no doubt but that the Jews borrow'd the hieroglyphics from the Egyptians, ſince the latter inſtructed them in ſeveral other cuſtoms both civil and religious: but without having recourſe to hieroglyphics, the altar might be large enough to contain the whole book of Deuteronomy. We have ſeen the whole goſpel of St. John writ ſo very ſmall, as to be contain'd in a nut-ſhell, &c.

written on a ſerpent's skin, and that all the acts of the martyrs have been collected, and [a] even their laſt words written. By the help of theſe abbreviations, men uſed to write ſurprizingly faſt. Auſonius relates, that ſome men writ faſter than any one could ſpeak, and uſed to write down whatever was dictated to them, before the words were quite out of the ſpeaker's mouth. Martial had told us the ſame thing [b].

In proceſs of time men uſed to write upon metal, and [c] Job cry'd out in his afflictions, Oh that my words——were graven with an iron pen and lead, in the lead for ever! When Judas Machabæus ſent an ambaſſador to the Romans, the offenſive and defenſive league which that people made with the Jews, was engrav'd [d] on tables of braſs, and ſent to Jeruſalem. When thoſe of Sparta heard that Jonathan was dead, and that his brother Simon had ſucceeded him in the dignity of high-prieſt, and the government of Judea, they alſo wrote to him on [e] brazen tables. In fine, all treaties, leagues, and all publick records, were generally writ on this metal.

They alſo made uſe of tables of wood on theſe occaſions. Some of theſe were cover'd with wax, but they generally uſed to write only on the wood. They ſometimes uſed tables made of the cedar-tree for that purpoſe, which therefore were ſo durable. Sometimes they would take any kind of wood, and only rub it over with a certain water that runs from the cedar, which preſerv'd it from worms. [f] Pliny relates, that the Egyptians uſed to employ this cedar-water in order to preſerve bodies from putrefaction.

The Arabians uſed antiently to write with the ſhoulder-bones of ſheep and camels, ſeveral of which tied together made up a book; whence we may naturally ſuppoſe, that they did not write much, ſince a great number of thoſe bones muſt go to the making up of a volume of an indifferent ſize. But this nation was not look'd upon as learned, at the time of the firſt eſtabliſhing of Mahometiſm, and long time before. [g] Pocock relates, that Ottoman and the firſt followers of Mahomet, employ'd the ſhoulder-bones of ſheep and camels, for writing down the idle conceits of their falſe prophet. This gives us an idea of their ruſticity, which continued till they began to carry on a correſpondence with the inhabitants of Medina, who were a much more polite people than the inhabitants of Mecca, the laſt of whom are now hinted at.

The Egyptians invented Papyrus, which was a kind of ruſh, whoſe skin they uſed to take off, and make very ſtiff with gum, after having beat it very well. All nations uſed to fetch this Papyrus from Egypt: from this period the number of books increas'd very much, as this plant did not require ſo much preparation, and lay in a much ſmaller compaſs than the tables which were before uſed for writing. But afterwards the Egyptians, growing jealous of the great number of books which foreigners made, and vex'd to find that they were as great maſters in that art as they themſelves, forbid the exporting of Papyrus out of Egypt. This prohibition gave occaſion to the inhabitants of Pergamus to prepare ſheep-skins, with which they made what is now call'd parchment, and call'd it Charta Pergamena upon that account. However, [h] Herodotus pretends, that the Ionians had invented it long before thoſe of Pergamus.

'Twou'd be almoſt impoſſible to ſay expreſſly who firſt invented letters, and the manner of expreſſing one's thoughts by characters; for we meet with nothing certain on that head.

[a] Suppoſing however, that they have been preſerv'd word for word as they ſpoke them, and that words were not put into their mouths.

head. The Phœnicians flatter'd themſelves with having been the inventors of it, and [a] Lucan tells us in his Pharſalia, that this was the moſt receiv'd opinion.

But if it were true, as has been already ſaid, that Enoch writ the hiſtory of the creation of the world on two pillars, it might be alledg'd, that the Phœnicians were not the firſt inventors of writing. However, they might nevertheleſs have firſt invented letters, tho' men might have rais'd monuments before their time, and have engrav'd ſeveral memorable incidents on ſtone or metal. This might have been done by [b] hieroglyphics inſtead of letters, which of themſelves have no manner of relation with the thing they repreſent. Such were in after-ages the letters which the Phœnicians employ'd, and which are uſed by us at this day. Thus mankind in the infancy of the world found out the art of expreſſing their thoughts by hieroglyphics, and the Phœnicians by letters, which, tho' they took up more ſpace than [c] hieroglyphics, they yet were made with leſs difficulty, and expreſs'd a thought in a much clearer manner: for 'tis well known that hieroglyphics were compos'd of the figures of plants and animals, ſo that no one in that caſe could be ſaid to write well, but what had a pretty good hand at [d] drawing.

When men began to uſe writing inſtead of hieroglyphics, the laſt were wholly confin'd to ſeals and coats of arms: and tho' [e] Clemens Alexandrinus advis'd the chriſtians of his time to make uſe of ſuch figures for their emblems as bore ſome affinity to chriſtianity, he yet ſuffer'd 'em to make uſe of ſeveral others which the heathens employ'd.

The Greeks alſo maintain, but without any manner of foundation, that they firſt invented writing. 'Tis univerſally agreed, that Cadmus brought it out of Phœnicia into Greece. 'Tis true indeed that the Greeks invented characters which were different from thoſe of the Phœnicians, but then it was not till many ages after they had borrow'd thoſe of the People above-mention'd; nor did they for a very long time employ the new ones, but in writing ſcholiums and annotations, which they uſed to note down either at the bottom of the page, or in the margin. Nevertheleſs, as the capital letters took up too much room, and being moſt of them ſquare, they therefore require an exact hand; they at laſt laid 'em aſide, and made uſe of the ſmall, and employ'd the former only Brelœuf has elegantly render'd 'em into French in the following manner.

C'eſt de lui que nous vient cet art ingenieux,
De peindre la parole & de parler aux yeux,
Et par les traits divers de figures tracées

In Engliſh thus:

Hence did the wondrous myſtic art ariſe,
Of painting ſpeech, and ſpeaking to the eyes.
Thus we by wondrous magic lines are taught,
How both to colour and embody thought.

[b] It may alſo have happen'd, that our forefathers had at firſt neither hieroglyphics, nor letters; and that the only thing they might make uſe of for the tranſmitting of tranſactions to poſterity, might be tradition, the knots of the Americans, and other inventions of the like nature. That afterwards finding thoſe to be but imperfect helps, they might have invented hieroglyphics, which were uſed by ſeveral eaſtern nations, by the Mexicans, and even by the inhabitants of Canada, if La Hontan is to be credited, who calls them the coats of arms of the Savages. This writer has hit upon the true name of the hieroglyphics, which bore, in ſome meaſure, an affinity with the coats of arms of the moderns; but with this difference, that thoſe nations who made uſe of hieroglyphics, were oblig'd to it from neceſſity, or perhaps in order to expreſs any thing with greater force and energy, whereas we only uſe 'em out of vanity.

[c] An hieroglyphic might have ſupply'd the place of a great number of terms, but then the thought would have been obſcure and enigmatical. 'Twou'd have been a very difficult matter to have carried arts and ſciences to any great height, by the aſſiſtance only of ſuch weak helps.

[d] Such as have ſeen the hieroglyphics of the Egyptians, Mexicans, &c. will eaſily allow, that tho deſigning part is not executed according to the rules of art. We are juſtly of opinion, that theſe hieroglyphics were the firſt rudiments of deſigning. If there be any thing that is worthy our admiration in hieroglyphics, 'tis the wit and invention, and not the drawing.

only in public inſcriptions, titles, and the beginnings of chapters. In proceſs of time the old letters were call'd initial. 'Tis well known that the Rabbi's have alſo their ſmall letters, in which they write their commentaries.

The Papyrus of Egypt has given name to our paper, which is one of the moſt uſeful and moſt commodious things that was ever found out by man. Nevertheleſs, tho' there be nothing more common among us than paper, we yet neither know the time when, nor who invented it. Some have pretended that it was uſed in Livy's time, who died the fourth of Tiberius; but they probably might have been miſtaken, ſince when that celebrated hiſtorian mentions tela linea, he poſſibly might have underſtood it of cloath on which they uſed to paint. 'Tis certain that paper is far from boaſting ſo antient a date.

Melchior Inchoffer, a German jeſuit, who liv'd in the middle of the laſt century, has carry'd things to another extreme, by maintaining that 'tis not above two centuries ſince paper was firſt invented; but 'tis very ſurprizing how a man of his character, who certainly had ſome knowledge of antiquity, cou'd be ignorant that we have ſeveral manuſcripts at this day, that are upwards of three hundred years old, and which nevertheleſs are written on paper like that which is now uſed. [a] Father Mabillon relates, that Mr. d'Herouval communicated to him a letter, written by Monſ. de Joinville to St. Lewis on common paper; whence he conjectures, that we may ſafely ſuppoſe, that paper has been invented theſe five hundred years.

'Tis a ſurprizing circumſtance as well as unhappineſs, that things of this nature ſhould continue hid in obſcurity, and that one can argue upon them but by conjecture only.

XXXIV. Their Armies, and Manner of making War.

I Was no longer ſurpriz'd at the accounts which hiſtorians give us of the numerous armies of Xerxes and Darius, after I had ſeen the camp of the Moors near Balaſſor. Theſe kinds of aſſemblies merit rather the name of a croud or rabble, than that of an army. 'Tis an aſſembly of men without order; in ſhort, a confus'd multitude of all kinds of people.

In the firſt place, every horſeman has always two or three ſervants at leaſt, and the ſame number of women along with him. The Omrahs, who are their commanders and general officers, have a proportionable number; ſo that in an army compos'd of an hundred thouſand perſons, there will hardly be found ten thouſand [b] fighting men. From whence we may judge what a confuſion the weakeſt ſide muſt neceſſarily be thrown into, when they are oblig'd to retire; and the great trouble their wives, their children, and a great quantity of uſeleſs baggage muſt put 'em to: and indeed they ſeldom make a judicious retreat.

Tho' the heathen Indians don't carry as many women along with them as the Moors, they yet have as many ſervants and uſeleſs people. The Faquirs among the reſt are intolerable upon this account, and are no leſs ſo in the Great Mogul's armies, which ſwarm with 'em, where their only employment is begging. They often fix the benevolence

[b] 'Tis certain, that the armies of the antient Perſians had the ſame defect, which ſtill prevails among the Turks, who are the moſt warlike and the beſt diſciplin'd of all the Eaſterns. The armies of the Chineze, modern Perſians, &c. have the ſame defect. So great a multitude of people may very eaſily occaſion a revolution in a whole kingdom, whence we may be leſs ſurpriz'd at that great one which happen'd in China in the laſt century. 'Tis impoſſible to keep a confus'd medley of people of all ranks and conditions to their duty, and to unite 'em in one common intereſt: not to mention that in too wide-extended monarchies, the remote provinces ſcarce look upon themſelves as branches of it. If the reader reflects on theſe circumſtances, he will not find it ſo very ſurprizing that the ſmall armies of Leonidas and Themiſtocles ſhould have check'd the progreſs, and even beat the Perſian army; or that the Macedonian phalanx, led on by Alexander the Great, ſhould have ruin'd the moſt powerful monarchy of all the Eaſt.

volence of the donor, according to his rank and quality, and are ſure never to bate him a penny of it. They will ſtand for four or five days together at a tent door, crying out all day and all night, as loud as ever they can bawl, give me ſo much, give me ſo much, (naming the ſum) ſo that the ſhorteſt way is to pay for one's quiet, by letting 'em at once have what they ask for.

The Moors and Indians have no notion of throwing themſelves into ſquadrons when they are engag'd in battle. They deal their blows about at all adventures; ſo that it would be a very eaſy matter for a ſmall ſquadron of horſe, that ſhould ſtand very cloſe together, to put a great multitude of them in diſorder. There are nevertheleſs ſome very brave ſoldiers among 'em; but theſe are few in number, and even the moſt reſolute among 'em always drink opium before they engage, which at the ſame time that it makes 'em furious and intrepid, renders 'em alſo inſenſible to danger.

The Indians have a very ſmall number of infantry among 'em, and theſe have as little notion of the evolutions as the horſe. Whenever they happen to be in an engagement, they always clap themſelves behind a thicket, whence they fire upon the enemy. Others, who are for engaging the enemy face to face, have generally no more than a pair of drawers on, in order to be encumbred as little as poſſible. They always put the greateſt value on thoſe who are the moſt nimble-footed; for we are not to imagine that two bodies of men that ſtand cloſe together, and in good order, ſhould advance towards one another with a deſign of breaking in upon each other's ranks. They are not for expoſing themſelves to ſo much danger: each man lays about him as he thinks proper; ſo that when they are engag'd together, one wou'd often conclude, they were playing at the childiſh ſport of priſon-baſe.

I believe that the Jews us'd antiently to fight pretty much after the ſame manner, if we may form a judgment from the praiſes which are beſtow'd in ſcripture on Aſahel the ſon of Zeruiah, Joab's brother, whom Abner kill'd, which ſays, that he was [a] as light of foot as a wild-roe. This quality would not be very praiſe-worthy in our days, and eſpecially in a general's brother.

'Tis well known that the Jews, in which they are directly the reverſe of the Moors, had a very ſmall number of cavalry. Their whole ſtrength conſiſted in their infantry, which might be owing to their country's lying leſs open than that of the Mogul: and indeed their enemies ever look'd upon 'em as very bad horſemen, and generally uſed to rally them upon that very account. When Rabſhakeh exhorted Hezekiah to ſubmit himſelf to Sennacherib, and not to lay any manner of ſtreſs on the aſſiſtance of the Egyptians, he offer'd that prince two thouſand horſe in the king of Aſſyria's name, provided he would acknowledge him for his lord, and ſubmit himſelf to him, he [b] adds, by way of raillery, I will give thee two thouſand horſes, if thou be able on thy part to ſet riders upon them. They nevertheleſs had a pretty conſiderable body of horſe in Solomon's time, and the [c] ſcripture relates, that this prince kept twelve thouſand horſe in pay, but we don't find that the Jews had any either before or ſince his time; ſo that we may naturally ſuppoſe, this body of ſoldiery ſubſiſted no longer than his reign. However, I don't believe, but that they had ſome few horſe, and 'tis even probable that Rabſhakeh might have puſh'd his raillery a little too far. Be that as it will, 'tis very certain that the Jews were not uſed to horſes, but uſed to ride on aſſes [d]. So that we [d] This ſhould make us be leſs ſurpriz'd at the ſcripture's ſo often uſing the aſs by way of ſimile and compariſon; the idea which the Jews had of this beaſt being different from that which we have. 'Tis very natural to employ compariſons, or to borrow ideas, from the cuſtoms of one's own country.

we are not to wonder at our Saviour's making his entrance into Jeruſalem upon the laſt mention'd beaſt, ſince that nation always employ'd this animal for that purpoſe. [a] No man was look'd upon as rich and great, whoſe ſtables were not fill'd with them; and the ſcripture, in order to expreſs the pomp and riches of Jair [b] the Gileadite, who judg'd the people of Iſrael after Tola, ſays, that he [c] had thirty ſons who rode on thirty aſs-colts. It relates much the ſame thing of [d] Abdon, who was one of the judges of Iſrael.

[e] The Indians uſe elephants in their armies to this day, in like manner as the antient Perſians and almoſt all the eaſtern nations. Theſe animals are ſurprizingly furious in battle; for not to mention that their bodies are cover'd over with iron to render them impenetrable to the ſhowers of arrows and musket-ball, which are pour'd in upon them from all quarters; their trunks are alſo arm'd with a great chain: with this they lay about with incredible ſwiftneſs, and it never fails to make a dreadful havock wherever it comes, particularly if the elephants are guided by skilful riders.

The Romans formerly felt the fury of the elephants, who kill'd a great number of their ſoldiers, and put 'em into great diſorder in the firſt battle. 'Twas not till after having been terribly haraſs'd by 'em, that they learnt the art of defending themſelves againſt this beaſt, and that was by ſhooting in their trunks, which is the moſt tender part in all their body. And the moment they find themſelves wounded here, they, inſtead of advancing towards thoſe who attack 'em, turn back upon their own riders, who after that find it impoſſible to govern 'em.

The cuſtom of employing elephants in war is of great antiquity in the Indies, even in the time of queen Semiramis. This queen, who carry'd her arms to the furthermoſt parts of India, obſerving the terrible havock thoſe animals made in her troops, had recourſe to a ſtratagem, [f] as Diodorus Siculus tells us, by carving great numbers of 'em in wood, and ſetting them at the head of her army. The Indians, who imagin'd ſhe had not one, and ſeeing ſo great a number of 'em ſtart up of a ſudden, were ſtruck with the utmoſt ſurprize. Nor were their horſes leſs terrified than if they had been living elephants, for they were made extremely natural. So that theſe people at firſt gave ground, and the Aſſyrians ſeeing 'em in diſorder, purſu'd them very briskly; but the reſt perceiving that the enemy, inſtead of coming againſt them with real elephants, had only brought ſo many wooden ones, reſum'd their courage, rallied, and fell upon the ſoldiers of Semiramis in their turn, and gain'd a very complete victory over them. [g] Diodorus moreover ſpeaks of certain people call'd Gandares, who inhabited the banks of the Ganges, and againſt whom Alexander did not think fit to turn the fury of his arms, becauſe of the great number of elephants they poſſeſs'd; or poſſibly, as Quintus Curtius obſerves, becauſe the Greeks might have oppos'd ſuch an attempt. And to ſay the truth, they had juſt reaſon to dread thoſe formidable animals, who, if there be but a pretty conſiderable number of them, and that they have but skilful riders, very often make dreadful havock in an army.

'Tis manifeſt from Quintus Curtius, that the elephants in Porus's army put the forces of Alexander to a ſtand, and that the Greeks found it a very difficult matter at firſt to defend themſelves againſt their prodigious ſtrength. This celebrated hiſtorian takes notice alſo of the love which the elephant on which king Porus rode on the day of battle bore to him; how he took up his maſter with his trunk, and ſeated him again on his back;

[a] The Indians meaſure the riches and power of a man by the number of his elephants. See Fryar's voyages. And the Arabians, &c. by the number of camels.

[b] 'Tis not the riches, but the great number of children, which the Jews conſider'd as a bleſſing, that are hinted at in this paſſage.

back; in ſhort, how he defended him to the laſt extremity, and till ſuch time as he was overwhelm'd by the repeated attacks of the Greeks: whence we may preſume, that if all the officers and ſoldiers of that unfortunate prince, had adher'd to him with as much rigour and reſolution as that poor beaſt did, Alexander would not, perhaps, have extended his conqueſts any farther.

THE Indians, with regard to their pleaſures, have the ſame taſte the antients had for flowers and eſſences; and in general, for every thing that is grateful to the ſenſe of ſmelling. Whenever a perſon of ſome diſtinction viſits another, thoſe who receive the viſit have long ſilver bottles, which caſt forth [a] roſe-water thro' little holes, much after the manner of our watering-pots.

With theſe they ſprinkle the face and head of their gueſts, by way of compliment. At the ſame time they preſent a plate, which is cover'd with powder of ſandal, a very fragrant wood; with this they rub the clothes of the viſitants; and as this powder is of a yellowiſh colour, and that moſt of the Indians are cloth'd in very fine white linnen, this produc'd an effect, which to me was at firſt very odd and ſurprizing; but recollecting a moment after, that great numbers of people in France [b] powder their black clothes almoſt down to their pockets, my ſurprize immediately ceas'd.

Their women of diſtinction generally employ themſelves in their retirement (for they lead almoſt as recluſe lives as the Turkiſh women) in making noſegays, garlands and crowns or chaplets of flowers, like to thoſe which the bridegroom wears publickly on his head on his wedding-day, in which they imitate the antient Greeks, who were very delicate in their pleaſures. 'Tis manifeſt from moſt of their epithalamiums, that they, not only on their wedding-day, but alſo during the whole ſpring and ſummer ſeaſons, uſed to be always crown'd with flowers, and thoſe newly gather'd, and the moſt [c] beautiful they could meet with.

XXXVI. Of their Unctions.

MOST nations have been of opinion, that oil was one of thoſe things which mankind could leaſt do without, imagining that it would be impoſſible for them to keep themſelves from the head-ach and all other pains, unleſs they rubb'd their heads every day therewith, or apply'd ſome to that part where they felt the pain. This cuſtom, which had at firſt been introduc'd from a kind of neceſſity, became, in proceſs of time, one of the chief inſtruments which luxury and effeminacy employ'd, in order to corrupt and deprave the mind.

This

[a] The Arabians ſprinkle their beards with it, and even aſcribe ſome ſacred virtue to it, which might be almoſt compar'd to that of holy-water. When Hungary-water firſt made its appearance, there was not a woman, maid, or beau, but complain'd of a dizzineſs or the heart-ach. It would have been impoſſible for all the water in Chriſtendom, to have had the thouſandth part of the extraordinary effects this Hungary-water had, and ever ſince that time, there are few modiſh people but what carry a bottle of it about them. Tho' holy-water has triumph'd for ſo many ages, ſtill no one has yet thought fit to carry any of it about them. Be this as it will, our Hungary-water may be put in parallel with the roſe-water uſed by the Indians. Both are proper to chear the ſpirits, and no doubt but that is the chief reaſon why the Indians ſprinkle with roſe-water.

[b] The antients uſed to powder themſelves with gold-duſt. There is ſome probability that this cuſtom might be alluded to in the 11th verſe of the 5th chapter of Solomon's Song. The head of my beloved is as the moſt fine Gold, &c.

[c] The antient Grecks uſed alſo to wear chaplets of flowers on their heads in their feaſts, and were particularly careful to make choice of ſuch as were contrary to drunkenneſs. They always adorn'd their heads, their necks, their arms with them in their carouſals, and alſo crown'd their goblets, &c.

This cuſtom, I ſay, took its riſe from a kind of neceſſity; for, as was juſt now obſerv'd, 'twas look'd upon as a ſovereign remedy againſt the head-ach, and particularly in hot-countries. 'Tis certain, that thoſe who rub their heads with oil are ſeldom bald. We read in ſcripture, that the Jewiſh women uſed to take great delight in theſe unctions, and frequently prefer'd them to the things moſt neceſſary for life. Thus the prophet's widow, who addreſs'd herſelf to Eliſha, notwithſtanding her great poverty and [a] extreme neceſſity, had yet oil to anoint herſelf with.

The Indians, and eſpecially their women, are no leſs fond of this cuſtom. They could hardly have a worſe puniſhment, than to be one moment without their heads gliſtening with oil; but as they have no olive-oil, they uſe that of cocoa.

The antients did not only anoint themſelves by way of preſervative againſt the head-ach, and for healing of wounds; but alſo in ſtrengthening the nerves, and to make their limbs ſupple, eſpecially after any laborious exerciſe. 'Tis thus we find in the Iliad, that Ulyſſes and Diomedes, after their return from taking a view of the Trojan army, [b] waſh'd, rubb'd themſelves with oil, and afterwards went to breakfaſt.

The Indians do the ſame at their return from a journey, or in general, after having wearied themſelves with any laborious exerciſe; for on theſe occaſions they never ſit down to eat or repoſe themſelves, till ſuch time as they have waſh'd, and rubb'd themſelves with oil.

'Twas antiently a cuſtom for all champions in the gymnaſtic exerciſes, to practiſe the ſame cuſtom, not only ſuch as wreſtled, to prevent their antagoniſts from laying hold of them, but all the reſt, in order to make their bodies more robuſt and their limbs more pliant.

Mankind, who at firſt had reſpect to uſefulneſs only in theſe unctions, never employ'd ſuch oils as were ſcented; inſenſibly they were for uniting pleaſure to profit, whereupon oil was heighten'd with perfumes and aromatic ſpices: Thus what at firſt was no more than a preſervative or remedy, became at laſt one of the moſt ſenſual pleaſures. After this, all ſuch as were deſirous of paſſing for beaux or very pretty fellows, were oblig'd to moiſten their hair with eſſence, and be ſuch as Bathyllus is repreſented in Anacreon; for in his advice to a painter, where he deſcribes to him the manner in which he would have the beautiful youth of Samos drawn, he tells him, he muſt make his [c] hair moiſt.

Virgil has deſcrib'd Turnus after the ſame manner, when he ſays, that his [d] hairs, which were curl'd with a red-hot iron, were all moiſt with myrrh.

Nay, ſo far did they carry their effeminacy, as not to be aſham'd of having their bodies rubb'd all over with eſſence by women. Nor did [e] Telemachus and Piſiſtratus, with all their wiſdom, ſcruple to have the ſame done to them after their return from viſiting the palace of Menelaus, and before they ſat down to eat.

Others uſed to rub every part of their body with odoriferous oils before they went to bed. Several of the primitive chriſtians obſerv'd this cuſtom, which [f] Clemens Alexandrinus cenſur'd in his cotemporaries.

But they were chiefly uſed by the fair-ſex. The ſtrongeſt perfumes of Arabia were too weak for them. 'Tis not very long ſince that the Europeans themſelves were of the ſame taſte; but as the mode chang'd, 'twas abſolutely neceſſary taſte ſhould change alſo; alſo; and that in order to ſuit one's ſelf to times and ſeaſons, the woman, who five and twenty years ago could with pleaſure have ſpent her life in the midſt of the moſt odoriferous perfumes, and who always wore ſcented gloves, ſhould faint at the ſight of certain flowers, or at the approach of the leaſt perfume. Altro tempo, altro guſto. Modes change with the age.

'Twas a cuſtom among the Jews, to preſent every man who came to viſit another, with eſſence to perfume his head; and there could not be a greater piece of rudeneſs or diſreſpect, than not to offer ſomething of this kind: thus when the Phariſee, with whom our Saviour eat, was very much offended that a woman, and, what was much more, a ſinful woman, ſhould come and anoint his feet; our Lord reproach'd him with ſaying, that ſhe had perform'd a duty which he himſelf ought to have obſerv'd. For he ſaid to him, [a] Mine head with oil thou didſt not anoint: but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment.

The Pſalmiſt, to denote his reſolution not to have any communication with ſinners, ſays, that [b] he will not anoint his head with his oil. The meaning of which is, That he will not viſit him, and conſequently will not be oblig'd to receive any of his civilities.

The antients not only uſed perfum'd oils and eſſences for themſelves, but alſo ſmear'd birds with it; an inſtance of which we meet with in a very pretty ode of Anacreon, where two doves are the interlocutors; one of which carried a letter from him to his beautiful Bathyllus. [c] Her companion congratulates her for having her wings perfum'd, and upon her diffuſing ſo agreeable an odour around.

The Indians generally preſent nothing but roſe-water to their viſitants, as was obſerv'd in the preceding article; but they always preſent oil every morning to ſuch gueſts as make any ſtay with 'em.

XXXVII. Their affected Outſide.

IT may be ſaid that the Indians, in general, are a very neat people; they are very careful of waſhing themſelves, and I am perſuaded, that the moſt rigid Phariſee could not exceed them in this particular: they alſo agree with 'em in ſeveral other points; as for inſtance, in their prayers, which they affect ſometimes to ſay in public, but chiefly, in their ſerious and compos'd outſide.

They look upon a paſſionate temper as the indication of a narrow ſoul, and ſhew the utmoſt contempt for all ſuch as cannot command their paſſions, or ſuffer themſelves to be inflam'd with anger. Whatever wrong or injury a man may do 'em, they never fail to keep their tempers, but this does not hinder their revenging themſelves; and whenever they have made a reſolution to hurt any man, they do it ſo much the more effectually, as well as dangerouſly, as 'tis always done in cold blood; not to mention that their revenge engroſſes all their thoughts. They even conceal their reſentments ſo well, that tho' they always ſtand upon their guard, eſpecially when they are conſcious of having wrong'd any perſon; they yet over-reach one another daily, and are frequently attack'd by thoſe whom they thought to be their deareſt and moſt faithful friends. Whenever they happen to be bit in this manner, they, without ſo much as once thinking upon the perſon who has deceiv'd them, vent only their complaints plaints againſt themſelves; never lay the blame on any one elſe, and own that they richly deſerv'd it, for having truſted one whom they had formerly offended: for 'tis a maxim with them, that injuries are never forgot. Notwithſtanding, they are in private the greateſt debauchees in the world, they yet are greatly reſerv'd in public. One never hears an obſcene word come out of their mouths, and they always affect a very modeſt behaviour outwardly: in fine, they might be propos'd as complete models of moral perfection, did their thoughts and actions agree with their expreſſions.

XXXVIII. How the Moguls divide the Day, and their Manner of meaſuring Time.

THE inhabitants of Mogul divide the natural day, which conſiſts of twenty-four hours, into eight parts; each of which is again ſubdivided into ſeveral others, according to the length of the days. As for inſtance, thoſe who inhabit near the line, and who have almoſt equal day and night, have but very little difference in their diviſions; however this difference is greater under the tropics, and always increaſes in proportion to the diſtance from the equinoctial.

They meaſure time by a water-clock, which however is very different from our Clepſydra or hour-glaſs, which is ſaid to have been invented by Cteſibius of Alexandria, about 634 years after the foundation of Rome. The Clepſydra was compos'd of two ſmooth baſons join'd cloſe together, one of which was full of water and the other empty. At the bottom of the latter was a piece of cork, which cover'd it all over, excepting ſo much as was neceſſary for the letting it go up and down with eaſe. On this cork ſtood a little figure that held a little ſtick in its hand, with which it pointed out the hours on the lines which were drawn on a little column that was fix'd at the edge of the baſon, and which rais'd itſelf above it. There was a communication between 'em by means of a little hole, and that which was full, emptied itſelf gently into the other in which the cork was, which the water rais'd by degrees. At the ſame time that the cork roſe, the figure which ſtood upon it roſe alſo, and by that means pointed out the hours with its ſtick.

The Clepſydra uſed by the inhabitants of Mogul, is in their language call'd Gari or Gadli, and has not ſo much work in it, but then it requires more attendance, a man being oblig'd to watch it continually. 'Tis a baſon fill'd with water, in which they put a little copper diſh, with a very ſmall hole in its bottom. The water comes by inſenſible degrees into this diſh, which when full, and that the water contain'd in it begins to mix itſelf with that in the baſon, it then ſinks to the bottom. The time which it takes up in filling is by them call'd a Gari, which, according to the obſervation I have made, amounts to twenty-two minutes, thirty ſeconds of time: ſo that when the day is exactly twelve hours in length, each part contains eight Garies, that is 180 minutes, or three hours. As the days ſhorten, there are leſs Garies in each part of the day, and more in thoſe of the night; for we are always to add to the one, what we ſubſtract from the other, becauſe the night and day together muſt regularly conſiſt of 64 Garies, that is 1440 minutes, or 24 hours. As ſoon as one Gari is ended, the perſon who watches the clock, ſtrikes as many blows upon a copper-table as there are Garies paſs'd; after which he ſtrikes others to ſhew the part, whether of the day or night.

Some perſons, according to Aben-Eſra, have pretended that the Teraphims, of which mention is ſo often made in ſcripture, were water-clocks, pretty like the Garies of the Moors: but they have advanc'd this without one corroborating proof, or even the leaſt ſhew of probability. The gods which Rachel ſtole from her father Laban, are indeed call'd Teraphims, Teraphims, but there is not one ſingle reaſon to induce us to believe that 'twas her father's clock ſhe run away with. This was not a thing of ſo much value, as to have oblig'd 'em to run away with it in a clandeſtine manner; or to have merited ſuch diligent ſearch as Laban made after it, who ranſack'd all Jacob's tent upon that account. Theſe Teraphims were houſhold gods, and not clocks. 'Tis alſo an error to think they ever ſpoke; or that Rachel carry'd them off, purely to prevent her father's conſulting 'em about her flight.

XXXIX. Their chief Temple.

'TWAS with reaſon that the Jews conſider'd the temple of Jeruſalem as the Lord's houſe; as a place that was truly holy, and in which God deſired particularly to be worſhipp'd.

The Mahometans have the ſame idea of Mecca, and the heathen Indians of the [a] Pagod of Jaguarnat, which is a large edifice built on the Sea-ſhore, pretty near Balaſſor. We are told that this Pagod is very rich, and that among other precious things, there is a very large ſtatue in it, with two emeralds of a prodigious ſize for its eyes; but as I myſelf have never been there, nor have met with any European who could give me a certain account of it, I therefore cannot pretend to be exact in the relation I ſhall give of it.

The Great Mogul has caus'd it to be inclos'd, at leaſt I have been told ſo, and that in order to put a ſtop to the numberleſs multitude of heathens, who uſed to come thither in pilgrimage from the remoteſt parts of the Indies, to the no ſmall advantage of the Bramins, who by that means got great ſums of money.

Theſe are the principal points wherein we have obſerv'd a conformity with regard to the cuſtoms of the Indians and thoſe of the antients, particularly the Jews. Was a man to argue upon the pagan ſyſtem, he undoubtedly would find a much greater affinity between them; as for inſtance, a Roman who had liv'd under Titus, who having been well acquainted with both, would have undertaken to write their characters.

We have drawn a parallel between the Jews and Indians with regard to their cuſtoms, religious and civil; we may alſo compare 'em together with reſpect to genius and the prejudices they have imbib'd. Both of them are continual ſlaves to prepoſſeſſion, which triumphs ſo much the more [b] over them, as they love and adore their captivity: 'tis their law which is here hinted at, it being the moſt inſupportable of all ſlaveries.

Theſe two people adhere ſo very ſcrupulouſly to every thing that ſavours ever ſo little of [c] antiquity, that it abſolutely prevents their making any progreſs in the ſciences; and keeps

[a] We may compare this Pagod to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, to that of Diana of Epheſus, that of Apollo at Delphos, or that of Ceres in Sicily, where the Romans uſed to ſend from time to time for the acquitting themſelves of their vows. We hope we ſhall not give any offence, if we find ſome reſemblance between theſe pilgrimages, and thoſe which the chriſtians make to our Lady of Loretto, and to St. James in Galicia, &c.

[b] We may ask the author of this diſſertation, what men are not ſubject to theſe prejudices; might they not be compar'd on this occaſion, with all the people, and all the religions in the world, not excepting that of the chriſtians? For we may conſider all ſuch chriſtians as ſlaves, as are not able to give any reaſon for their belief. There is no neceſſity that a perſon in low life ſhould examine the particulars of the ſeveral articles in the creed, but then he ought to be able to give good reaſons why he believes in them. Such as are negligent upon this head, are not more acceptable in the ſight of God, than a Braſilian who lives up to the rules of morality, and does not devour his fellow-creatures. Let us therefore conclude, that mankind in general may be compar'd to one another with regard to genius and prejudice.

[c] He ſhould have ſaid, that both of them adhere zealouſly to tradition, and then the parallel would have been juſtly drawn. This tradition, when too blindly follow'd, is not only a ſhelf on which both Jews and Indians, but even the Chriſtians themſelves ſplit. We will ſuppoſe that novelty terrifies an Indian, but we cannot comprehend why it ſhould have the ſame effect on Chriſtians, when it aims only at inſpiring them with the ſpirit of chriſtianity. We muſt confeſs, that the minds of men have ſometimes a very mechanical turn.

keeps them in the blind ignorance of their foreſathers, they being frighted at the leaſt appearance of novelty; and think it a crime to improve ever ſo little on what their anceſtors have advanc'd.

[a] The whole knowledge of theſe people goes no further than in their getting by heart the ſeveral things which they ſay that God or the gods have done for 'em, together with ſome books of morality, whoſe precepts they learn very carefully, and which they are every moment repeating with an affected gravity; an equal indication of their ignorance as well as preſumption.

They make war as it were only by ſtarts, and conquer in the ſame manner; or rather they are to be conſider'd only as ſo many machines, which their [b] prieſts ſet a going, and whom they inſpire with fear or intrepidity, according to the aſſurances they give them of the good or ill ſucceſs of the battle.

[c] They ſometimes fight with the utmoſt obſtinacy for the defence of their Religion; which, as it is founded on ſome promiſe of their ſoothſayers, muſt neceſſarily be very nearly allied to a ſpirit of fury; and theſe poor wretches don't perceive that the greater number of victories they gain, they only enſlave themſelves the more, and increaſe the weight of their chains, by giving their prieſts an opportunity of ſettling the laws, or rather tyranny, upon a ſtronger foundation.

[d] As they look upon all other nations as profane, and refuſe to have any familiarity with foreigners, and univerſally deſpiſe all but their own dear ſelves, we are not to wonder if they are equally contemn'd in their turn.

[e] The Jews look'd upon their ſubordination to the Romans as the greateſt misfortune that could poſſibly have befallen 'em: nevertheleſs, nothing in the world could have been more advantageous, for the correſpondence they by that means obtain'd with the moſt polite and moſt learned men in the world, having open'd their eyes a little, it hereby gave them an opportunity of indulging a freedom of thought, and of being no longer tied down to think as their foreſathers. And indeed, ſome of theſe applied themſelves afterwards to the ſtudy of the hiſtory of other nations, and the polite arts, of which they were utterly ignorant before.

The Indians are as much ſlaves as ever, and it will be equally happy for them, ſhould any civiliz'd nation break their chains by the conqueſt of their country.

They were very near being reſcu'd from their captivity in the time of [f] Alexander the Great. Had the Greeks but continued longer in the Indies, they would infallibly have communicated to them both their politeneſs and learning: but this hero was for conquering ſo many nations, that he could ſcarcely flatter himſelf with the hopes of bringing ſo much as one under ſubjection, or making them ſubmit to the laws of the conqueror. He was no ſooner in one country, but he flew the next moment into another: like to thoſe torrents, which the faſter they drive along, the fewer marks they leave of their courſe.

One

[a] The knowledge of a numberleſs multitude of chriſtians goes no further than this. Several of theſe repeat by heart the ten commandments, to which others add certain prayers. The Roman-Catholicks learn the Creed, the Lord's-prayer, and the Ave-Maria, with a few prayers to the ſaints; the hereticks learn ſpiritual ſongs, and ſome of David's Pſalms. In this conſiſts the devotion of both.

[b] Our clergy often act in the ſame manner, and the wars which they foment are always the moſt fatal.

[c] The parallel might be juſtly drawn with the chriſtians, to our ſhame be it ſpoken. Conſpiracies have been form'd, and wars have been undertaken, barely on theſe promiſes. There is no neceſſity of deſcending to particulars, ſince any one who will give himſelf the trouble to look into the hiſtory of our times, will be plainly convinc'd of the truth of this aſſertion.

[d] We alſo are guilty of the ſame fault. It muſt be confeſs'd that the chriſtian Religion is excellent in itſelf; but then were it not more laudable to bring over infidels and hereticks by gentleneſs and inſtruction, than to make 'em more obſtinate by violence and contempt?

[e] There are ſome nations in Europe, to whom it has been in like manner repreſented the correſpondence they might have with certain iſlanders, who happily poſſeſs a freedom in thinking. We don't ſay, that 'twou'd be a happineſs for us to become their ſubjects, but we believe it would certainly be ſo were we to imbibe part of their principles. We have for ſeveral years reap'd great benefit from their notions, by the commerce which we are obliged to carry on with 'em, and which will be ſtill greater, when we ſhall have ſhook off the chains of thoſe, who would willingly become our fathers and maſters.

[f] The reader may compare theſe times of Alexander to others much leſs remote.

One who was to declare for the antients, or a perſon of a greater ſeverity of temper, would expreſs himſelf very differently from this, with regard to the Jews and Indians, tho' he were not to make any diſtinction between their religions, but conſider'd 'em on the ſame foot. I believe, from the few remarks which I have made on thoſe two nations, he might form the following reflections.

[a] Both Jews and Indians, at leaſt a great part of them, have preſerv'd the ſimplicity which prevail'd in the infancy of the world. This is manifeſt from their food, their dreſs, and their pleaſures, in all which, plainneſs is chiefly conſulted. They are moſt delighted with ſuch things as preſent themſelves to their minds with the greateſt ſimplicity, and moſt naturally flatter their imaginations.

The fear they are under of falling into error, makes 'em adhere very ſcrupulouſly to the counſels of the moſt wiſe and learned among 'em, from this conſideration, that nothing can be more dangerous for mankind in general, but eſpecially for ſuch as are uninform'd with experience, to attempt to walk by no other rule than ſuch a one as is ſuggeſted by their own underſtandings.

The Indians obſerve very punctually the ſeveral injunctions which the religion they profeſs preſcribes; and as they know that mankind cannot be their own maſters in every reſpect, but are in ſome meaſure born to ſubjection, they chuſe to worſhip their Gods, and yield a blind ſubmiſſion to their law, rather than [b] be ſlaves to caprice and ambition, like moſt other nations in the world.

They never apply [c] themſelves to any of the ſciences, but ſuch as are of abſolute neceſſity; looking upon the reſt as acquiſitions, which tho' they enlarge the human faculties, they yet make a man more unhappy, and uſually ſwell him with pride.

They are ſenſible that vice is much more apt to inſinuate itſelf into the mind than virtue, for which reaſon they ſhun all familiarity with foreigners, for fear of being infected with their ill cuſtoms and vices. 'Twas to prevent their being forc'd to live among 'em, that they were ſometimes prompted to make ſuch ſtrenuous and ſurprizing efforts in order to keep them from entring into their country, or to drive them out from it.

Their brains are never projecting of novelties, but are employ'd wholly on traffic, or the ſeveral trades which their fathers had taught 'em, in which particular they differ greatly from thoſe nations to whom we give the name of polite and civiliz'd, who are never ſatisfy'd with what their predeceſſors have left 'em, but on the contrary are eternally torturing their imaginations in order to invent ſomething new, and to force nature as it were; and whoſe reputations increaſe in proportion as they deviate from thoſe paths in which their anceſtors had trod, and which nature herſelf had pointed out to them.

[a] The parallel is not juſtly drawn on this occaſion. The Jews are very far from obſerving any ſimplicity on that head, but are on the contrary great friends to pomp and luxury, and ſet every engine to work, in order to join art and nature together in their pleaſures.

[b] This Reflection is no ways juſt. The wars and revolutions which happen in the Indies, are a proof that thoſe nations often make a political, of a purely religious affair; and that 'tis the ſame in Aſia as in Europe, where thoſe who are the moſt zealous ſticklers for the Deity, are not always his beſt friends.

[c] As for the Jews they neglect the ſciences, and apply themſelves to buſineſs only: but this they do from judgment and reflection, well knowing that there is nothing to be got by learning.

XL. Of the Indies in general, and the Cuſtoms of its Inhabitants.

I Hope the reader will pardon me, if, notwithſtanding the reſolution I had made of writing only on the conformity between the cuſtoms of the Indians and thoſe of the Antients; I now ſhould wholly lay aſide antiquity, to give a ſhort account of the Indies, in the ſtile and manner of other travellers. However, I don't flatter myſelf ſo far as to imagine that I ſhall write any thing new, but on the contrary am perſuaded that I ſhall relate nothing but what ſeveral others have ſaid before me; but the reader may depend I ſhall not be very prolix on this head, nor would I once have touch'd upon it, had it not been to avoid an appearance of ſingularity, and to ſhew I was not too fond of my firſt notions.

Moſt people who have never ſtirr'd from home, form to themſelves an advantageous idea of diſtant countries. They fancy they abound with all things neceſſary for life, and imagine them to be exempt from all thoſe defects, all thoſe diſagreeable particulars, which are found in their own. They conſider them as regions moſt exquiſitely delightful, becauſe moſt travellers have deſcrib'd 'em as ſuch, and indeed thoſe gentlemen uſually paint the countries they have viſited in the moſt agreeable colours.

I had read ſeveral deſcriptions of foreign countries, before my leaving Europe. In theſe they were generally repreſented as ſo many inchanting places: every thing in them was beautiful, every thing lovely, and the moſt innocent pleaſures preſented themſelves in crouds. The inhabitants of thoſe happy climes wanted nothing to make their felicity everlaſting, but a poſſibility of living eternally. I myſelf was of the ſame opinion, becauſe travellers aſſur'd me it was ſo; but I undeceiv'd myſelf, by viſiting thoſe countries which had been deſcrib'd in ſuch glaring terms. I have generally obſerv'd, that moſt travellers who had writ upon 'em, very much heighten'd their beauties, but had touch'd but very lightly on the inconveniencies which are found in them, or thoſe diſagreeable things which perſons are oblig'd to undergo in them.

The Author of nature has diſtributed his bleſſings pretty equally over the ſeveral countries of the world. Good and bad are every where met with, and 'tis a very difficult matter for a man, who has ſeen ſeveral countries, to live a long time in one, without regretting another; becauſe there is not one country to be found, in which there is not ſomething wanting, which may eaſily be met with in another. So that we ought to lay aſide all thoſe prejudices which we may have entertain'd in this reſpect, and not imagine that there is one ſingle ſpot in the whole world, that has all things deſirable, and in which, pleaſures and pains do not alternately ſucceed each other.

The coaſt of Coromandel is in the torrid zone, where heat rages with the utmoſt violence. There are certain winds here which blow continually during ſome ſeaſons of the year, which are call'd land-winds, becauſe they blow from the land, and theſe are prodigiouſly troubleſome: they generally laſt from nine or ten in the morning, till three or four in the afternoon. None but the natives dare ſtir out during that time, for every ſtep a man takes, he ſeems to have ſo much fire thrown in his face, eſpecially between the hours of ten and two. This land-wind is ſucceeded by another that blows from ſea, which riſes the moment the other is laid, and is ſo much the more agreeable, the more the heat has been violent during the day. 'Tis then a man may enjoy all the pleaſures of walking.

Men conſider the verdure, with which the trees in hot countries are perpetually cloth'd, as the greateſt beauty that is to be met with in theſe regions, but are nevertheleſs miſtaken, ſince uſe makes it no longer a pleaſure; and I cannot ſay, whether the variety of ſeaſons which we have in Europe is not ſomething more agreeable; for as India does not feel the ſeverity of our winter ſeaſon, ſo neither have they any thing that may be compar'd to the beauty of our ſpring. 'Tis there one perpetual ſummer, that burns up the graſs, and dries up the fields, which, after the rainy ſeaſon, never continue green above two months.

The rains fall regularly in thoſe ſeaſons, and laſt generally from the middle of June to the middle of September, during which there ſeldom happens the leaſt interval of fair weather. They are leſs troubleſome at Pondichery than in other places, becauſe as 'tis a ſandy ground, it does not ſpoil the roads, which, during that time, are almoſt impaſſable in the kingdom of Bengal, becauſe of the richneſs of the ſoil. Theſe rains are abſolutely wanted in the Indies, for whenever they fail to deſcend, as rice requires a great deal of moiſture, they are ſure to be afflicted with famine.

Rice is the common food of the inhabitants of the country. This they firſt boil, and afterwards toſs up with butter, ſaffron and herbs. Others eat it with meat, or fiſh, and then call it Caris. They ſeaſon it very high with pepper, which makes theſe Ragoos not altogether ſo agreeable to the palate, as they would otherwiſe be.

They have game enough, ſuch as wild-boars, roe-bucks, hares, partridges, wood-pigeons, a great quantity of ſnipes, wild-ducks, teal, and all kinds of water-fowl; but I never ſaw any rabbits there.

There is hardly any better fiſh in the world than at Pondichery, and they have one among the reſt which they call Pamper. 'Tis a flat fiſh, and may beſt be compar'd to our turbots, except that 'tis not quite ſo thick; but then the fleſh is as firm, and taſtes as well. They have alſo very good mullets.

They have a great quantity of fruits, but they are all very different from ours. The Mangue is mightily valued there, whoſe taſte is very much like that of our peach, which however is much larger, but has not near ſo large a ſtone, and its leaves are very like that of the peach. Theſe Mangues are excellent when they are of the right ſort, but the others are ſtringy. 'Twou'd be needleſs to trouble the reader with an account of the variety of fruits which their ſoil produces; for not to mention that this wou'd carry us to too great lengths, 'twou'd be almoſt impoſſible to give a juſt idea of them to ſuch as have never ſeen or taſted them.

Both lemmons and oranges are pretty common in the Indies, but far leſs ſo than in America, which abounds more with thoſe kind of fruits than any other country in the world. I nevertheleſs have ſeen a ſmall kind of orange in the iſland of Moeli, which I never met with in America. They are no bigger than our Pomme d'Apis, and have a red peel. 'Tis of a more watry ſubſtance than our common orange; and as they ripen, their rind, which is ribb'd like that of a melon, opens like that of a pomgeranate.

There are in that iſland a great quantity of Caſſia-trees. The manner how the ſticks are made in which that kind of purgative-gum is put, is pretty well known in Europe. They are long and dry when ripe, and whenever the wind blows, the ſticks with which thoſe trees are loaded, wave up and down, and ſo ſtrike againſt each other, which is a very ſtrange noiſe to ſuch perſons as don't know what it is owing to, eſpecially if they happen to be in the midſt of a foreſt, when they ſometimes hear this claſhing ſound at a great diſtance from 'em.

There is no man who has been in the Indies, but muſt have heard of Betel, which, next to rice, is the food that is moſt eaten there, and which the Indians, and even a great number of Europeans, can leaſt live without.

This Betel is a plant that riſes pretty much like our virgin-vine. Each of theſe plants has a vine-prop about 15 foot high. Its leaf is pretty much like that of the Lilach or Arabian-Bean, except that 'tis thinner. The Indians eat this as a great dainty, but never alone. They firſt rub it with a little lime made of ſhells, after which they take little ſlices of Arregua cut very thin, and wrap them up in the leaf. This Arregua is a fruit that is exactly the ſame as the nutmeg, except that it has no ſmell. This mixture of Betel leaves, of lime, and Arregua, is call'd Betel. Such perſons as are in good circumſtances, add ſome Cachoo to it, which is an eatable perfume, pretty well known in Europe, tho' it comes from the Indies. This medley of drugs makes their lips and teeth as red as blood.

'Tis certain that the plant Betel boaſts a great many virtues. 'Tis very healing to the ſtomach, and ſuch as eat of it regularly, are never out of order, nor are they ever afflicted with the tooth-ach, it preſerving the teeth firm and ſtrong, tho' they turn red.

The inhabitants of the country generally preſent one another with Betel, in the ſame manner as we offer ſnuff, and they never go any where without carrying a little of it about 'em. We are told that 'tis dangerous to take any from the women, unleſs a man perfectly acquainted with 'em, becauſe they are ſaid to make Philters or love-potions of them, and for this purpoſe they work it up with certain drugs fit for that purpoſe.

I cannot affirm this to be true, but however will aſſure the reader, that I ſaw one of our ſoldiers, who after refuſing to eat any thing for two days together, deſerted in order to run after a woman, whom they aſſur'd me had given him Betel; tho' the creature certainly was not worth running after, ſhe being both old and ugly, whereas the ſoldier was a handſome fellow about thirty. They ſometimes alſo poiſon their enemies with this plant.

I forgot to mention, that whenever any Indian is wounded, he chews Betel leaves, and applies them to the wound, and this is found to be as efficacious, and heal as quick as balm.

The greateſt part of India is a perfect deſart, ſo that a man is often oblig'd to go a long way to find a poor cottage, or a few miſerable villages, the moſt part of which are abandon'd. This devaſtation is owing to the continual wars of the Great Mogul, who began by ruining the country of the Indians, in order to make himſelf maſter of it; and who, from a political view, always oppreſſes the people, and keeps them miſerably poor, for fear they ſhould ſhake off his yoke: for notwithſtanding the great havock that has been made of them, they are ſtill much more numerous than the Moors. A man cannot forbear being touch'd with compaſſion, when he reflects on the ſlavery of theſe people, and the total ruin of their country; and when he compares the deplorable ſtate to which they are now reduc'd, with that they were in but an hundred years ago.

The Aſiatics have always been look'd upon as a ſoft and effeminate people. This is certainly their juſt character, for they are utter enemies to labour, and great lovers of eaſe and repoſe. Whenever they are oblig'd to work, they go about it with a certain indolent air, which plainly diſcovers they are out of their ſphere. As for my part, I aſcribe this indolence to the violent heat of the climate, for I have ſeen ſeveral Europeans there, who had contracted the ſame ill habit in a very little time.

This indolence and love of eaſe, makes 'em ſet every engine at work, in order to procure the ſeveral conveniencies of life; and they are ſure of ſucceeding, if they take but ever ſo little pains. 'Tis true, indeed, that a man does not ſee ſuch a multitude of fine people, nor enjoy the agreeable company which delights ſo much in Europe; but then it muſt be confeſs'd, that the kind of independance which one enjoys in thoſe remote countries, is wonderfully agreeable. People are here leſs ſlaves to a pretended decorum than in other places. They enjoy the utmoſt liberty, and every man lives as he thinks proper. Moreover, a man may there cut a great figure at a little expence, eſpecially with regard to ſervants, who in that country may be had for a ſmall matter.

The Indians in general, may be divided into Moors, Heathens, and Topas. The Moors, as was already obſerv'd, are the maſters; the Heathens, the ſlaves; and the Topas are, properly ſpeaking, neither the one nor the other.

Theſe Topas or Meſtizos are the poſterity of Portugueze men and Indian women. Their uſual profeſſion is that of bearing arms, and tho' they have neither the riches nor the complexion of their foreſathers, (for they are black, beggarly fellows) they yet have preſerv'd their gravity. I believe that they were call'd Topas, from their wearing hats, becauſe Topica-log, ſignifies Hat-people in the Mooriſh language. The Great Mogul has a great number of theſe Topas in his armies, where they generally ſerve as gunners. The French, the Engliſh, and the Dutch, have alſo ſeveral of 'em in their pay. They ſpeak broken Portugueze, which is the language uſed for traffic in the Indies, and every one who has dealings in thoſe countries, is oblig'd to learn it.

'Tis well known that the Portugueze were formerly maſters of the Indies, whoſe monarchs all trembled at their nod. Francis d'Almeida, vice-roy for the king of Portugal in the Indies, defeated Campſon the Egyptian Soldan in a ſea-fight. This was in the beginning of the 16th century; and the famous Alphonſo d'Albuquerque his ſucceſſor, acquir'd no leſs fame by the taking of Goa, and ſeveral other victories which he gain'd over the Indians. But they are greatly fallen ſince that time, and moſt of the other Europeans, who are at preſent ſettled in the Indies, have eſtabliſh'd themſelves merely on their ruins; eſpecially the Dutch, who are at this time what the Portugueze were formerly.

The Europeans were not the only people whom the Portugueze had to deal with; they alſo had great ſquabbles with the Indians: theſe, wearied with their tyranny and oppreſſion, roſe up againſt them in ſeveral places. Of this number were the inhabitants of the iſland of Moeli, who are all Mahometans, and are ſaid to have come originally from Arabia. Theſe, after having cut all the Portugueze to pieces, ſeiz'd upon the iſland. I have ſeen a moſque which was formerly a Portugueze church.

Beſides theſe Meſtizos, who are the real poſterity of the Portugueze, there are alſo others who take upon themſelves the name of Topas. Theſe are the Parias, of whom mention has been already made. Theſe, whenever they turn chriſtians, immediately wear hats; whereby, from the loweſt and moſt contemptible rank that is among the Indians, they are rais'd at once to the quality of Senhor-Soldad, a dignity of no ſmall conſideration among the chriſtians of the country. They are, however, had in the utmoſt contempt by the reſt of the Indians, who know very well, that moſt of them who embrace the chriſtian religion, are a ſett of beggarly wretches; for which reaſon they give them the name of Chriſtianos d'Aros, that is, Rice-Chriſtians; intimating thereby, that the ſole motive of their changing their religion, was in order to procure themſelves the neceſſaries of life with greater eaſe, and to be ſure of having ſome rice to eat, for we never hear of bread in that country. To ſpeak the truth, I don't find that the Indians are ſo much to be blam'd upon that account, for 'tis certain, that thoſe Parias ſeldom ſcruple to do the vileſt offices; and tho' they turn chriſtians, that does not make them honeſter men. They are very much addicted to thieving, and when they cannot find an opportunity of carrying off any thing with their hands, they will be ſure not to let it eſcape their feet, which they employ with great art and dexterity. The reader will undoubtedly be ſurpriz'd at what is here ſaid, nevertheleſs, 'tis certainly fact. If a perſon happens to let fall a piece of ſilver, a knife, or a fork, and does not happen to perceive it immediately, theſe Parias, who generally go bare-footed, take it up very dextrouſly with their toes; which being done, they lay their hand behind 'em, and find out means, by bending the leg, to carry up to their hands, whatever they have thus taken up with their foot. They carry on all this hocus pocus without ſtooping their bodies in the leaſt: nay, they ſhall talk to you at the very time that the game is carrying on, eſpecially if 'tis in the evening. One would imagine they thought it beneath 'em to work the moment they turn chriſtians. I heard a man of probity ſay, that happening to ſpeak one day to a young woman who had been catch'd in the exerciſe of a trade which is very common in the Indies, and who, in all likelihood, had done ſomething elſe, (for they don't puniſh any body for the reſt) he ask'd her, why ſhe did not work for her livelihood? To which the young woman, prodigiouſly ſurpriz'd at his queſtion, anſwer'd, Why! I'm a Chriſtian. A very pretty reply!

PREFACE.

HAVING, by God's Providence (who directs our steps as to him seemeth most proper) obtain'd a cure of souls in the Adventure of the honourable company of merchants trading to the East-Indies; it happen'd that I was transferr'd from my charge on board the ship, to reside in their chief factory in Guzzarat, in a place called Surrat, with Mr. Tho. Kerridge, who presided over their affairs in that country: where, agreeable to the curiosity of travellers, inquiring what novelties might be there found, I observ'd a people clothed in linnen garments, which descended pretty low, whose gesture and dress seem'd something effeminate. Their countenance was shy and a little estranged, yet smiling, from a bashful familiarity; and were drawn thither by the affairs of the COMPANY.

As my eyes were wholly unacquainted with such objects, they were some time fix'd in wonder; and this admiration, the certain indication of a young traveller, immediately rais'd my curiosity. I ask'd what kind of people those were, who bore so odd an aspect? I was answer'd, that they were Banians, a people foreign to the knowledge of the christian world; their religion, rites, and customs, sparingly treated of by any; and themselves no less reserv'd in divulging them: however, that they borrow'd some opinions from the philosopher Pythagoras, with regard to the transmigration of souls. Hence I thought so great a novelty, would make the discovery thereof grateful and acceptable to many of my countrymen; especially since some of my predecessors had scrupled to bring this religion to light: but whether it were, that they were deterr'd with the fictions and chimæras, which the Banian writings abound with, which might make it unworthy of notice; or that it might be owing to the shyness of the Bramins, who will scarce admit a stranger into their company; the work was left to that man who would chalk to himself a path through all these impediments.

The

The preſident, Mr. Thomas Kerridge, was urgent with me to redeem their omiſſions, and to ſee if I could work ſomewhat out of this neglected ſubject. The truth was, I was deſirous of gaining his affection by obeying his commands; who, the better to promote this undertaking, intereſted himſelf very much in the work, by introducing me into the acquaintance of the Bramins; not to mention that his eminence of place very much forwarded the diſcovery I intended to make.

Preſuming that my compliance would be taken in good part, in caſe I could preſent my countrymen with any thing new from theſe foreign regions, I began my work, and endeavoured to extract materials for the ſame out of their manuſcripts; and by repeated acceſs, with the aſſiſtance of Interpreters, made my collections out of a book of theirs called the SHASTER, which is to them as a Bible, containing the grounds of their religion in a written word.

If therefore any perſon be curious of peruſing the religion, rites, and cuſtoms of theſe Banians, (omitting, for the moſt part, ſuch prodigious fictions as ſeem independant on ſenſe and reaſon;) they will here meet with the eſſence and grounds of this ſect, digeſted into ſuch a form, as will beſt exhibit the knowledge thereof; and ſuch, as I preſume, were never before publiſh'd. For the truth of which, I refer to the following pages.

A DISCOVERIE OF THE BANIAN RELIGION.

INTRODUCTION.

" " " " " " " THE Banians are a people of Eaſt-India, of whom there are great numbers in the kingdom of Guzurat or Cambaya. They are meanly cloath'd, wearing only a kind of linnen Surtout, that deſcends pretty low; they have a ſimple and effemi-nate mien, and are look'd upon by the Mahometans in thoſe countries, with pretty near the ſame eye, as the Jews by the Chriſtians. They profeſs great probity and ſincerity, and " having a very large acquaintance in thoſe countries, are employed as brokers, by " the Engliſh and Dutch merchants, in buying and ſelling their commodities. How-" ever we are aſſur'd, that notwithſtanding their boaſted ſimplicity, a man muſt be " upon his guard whenever he has any dealings with them; and that they never fail " to over-reach, whenever they can do it with impunity. All who have written on " thoſe countries mention their religion; but their relations on this head are ſo vari-" ous, as plainly ſhows they knew very little of the matter; and that what little " they did know, was merely by hear-ſay: ſo far were they from having diſcover'd " the motives of their worſhip, or religious ceremonies."

CHAP. I.

Of God, the creation of the world, the creation of the firſt man and woman, and the progeny from them deſcending, as it is by the Banians deliuered.

THE great God (ſay the Banians) being alone, bethought himſelfe how hee might make his excellency and power manifeſt to others; for his great vertue had beene obſcured and hid, if it had not beene communicated to his creatures. What meanes might then bee better to giue euidence of both theſe, then the crea-tion of a world, and creatures therein?

For this cauſe the Almighty conſulted with himſelfe, about the making of this great worke, which men call the world or vniuerſe, and as the ancients (ſay they) haue deliuer'd; the Lord made foure elements as the ground-worke of this mighty frame; to wit, earth, aire, fire, and water: which foure elements were at firſt all mingled together in a confuſion, but the Almighty ſeparated them in manner following.

Firſt, it is deliuered, that by ſome great cane or like inſtrument, hee blew vpon the waters, which aroſe into a bubble, of a round forme like an egge, which ſpread-ing it ſelfe further and further, made the firmament ſo cleare and tranſparent, which now compaſſeth the world about..

After this, there remaining the earth, as the ſediment of the waters, and ſome liquid ſubſtance with the ſame; the Lord made of both theſe together, a thing round like a ball, which hee called the lower world, the more ſolid part whereof became the earth, the more liquid the ſeas; both which making one globe, he by a great noyſe or humming ſound, placed them in the middeſt of the firmament, which became æqui-diſtant from it on euery ſide.

Then he created a ſunne and moone in the firmament, to diſtinguiſh the times and ſeaſons: and thus theſe foure elements that were at firſt mixt together, became ſeparate, and aſſigned to their ſeuerall places; the aire to his place, the earth to his, the water to his place, and the fire to his place.

Theſe elements thus diſpoſed, each of them diſcharged his ſeueral parts; the aire filled vp whatſoeuer was emptie; the fire began to nouriſh with his heate; the earth brought forth his liuing creatures; and the ſea his. And the Lord conuey'd to theſe a ſeminall vertue, that they might bee fruitfull in their ſeuerall operations; and thus the great world was created.

This world, as it had its beginning from foure elements, ſo it was meaſured by foure maine points of the compaſſe; Eaſt, Weſt, North, and South; and was to be continued for foure ages; and to be peopled by foure Caſts or ſorts of men, which were married to foure women appointed for them, of which we ſhall ſpeake as order may giue occaſion.

God hauing thus made the world, and the creatures thereto belonging; then God created man, as a creature more worthy then the reſt, and one that might be moſt capable of the workes of God. The earth then did at God's voyce and command, render this creature from his bowels, his head firſt appearing, and after that his body, with all the parts and members of the ſame, into whom God conuey'd life, which as ſoone as he had received, witneſſed it ſelfe: for colour began to ſhew it ſelfe red in his lippes, his eye-liddes began to diſcloſe the two lights of nature, the parts of his body bewrayed their motion, and his vnderſtanding being informed, hee acknowledged his maker, and gaue him worſhip.

That this creature might not bee alone, who was made by nature ſociable, God ſeconded him with a companion, which was woman; to whom not ſo much the outward ſhape, as the likeneſſe of the minde and diſpoſition ſeemed agreeing: and the firſt mans name was Pourous, and the womans name was Parcoutee; and they liued conjoyned together as man and wife, feeding on the fruites of the earth, without the deſtruction of any living creature.

Theſe two liuing in this conjunction had foure ſonnes; the firſt was called Brammon, the ſecond Cuttery, the third Shuddery, the fourth Wyſe. Theſe foure brethren were of natures diſtinct each from the other; the foure elements claiming in each of them a different predominance: For Brammon was of an earthly conſtitution, and therefore melancholly; and Cuttery was of a fiery conſtitution, and therefore of a martiall ſpirit. Shuddery was of a flegmaticke conſtitution, and therefore of a peaceable or conuerſable diſpoſition; Wyſe was of an ayery temper, and therefore full of contriuements and inuentions.

And becauſe Brammon was of a melancholly conſtitution, and ingenious; God indued him with knowledge, and appointed him to impart his precepts and lawes vnto the people; his graue and ſerious looke, beſt fitting him for ſuch a purpoſe: for which cauſe hee gaue him a booke, containing the forme of diuine worſhippe and religion.

And becauſe Cuttery was of a martiall temper, God gaue him power to ſway kingdomes with the ſcepter, and to bring men into order, that the weale publicke might thriue by vnited indeavours for the common good: as an embleme of which the Almighty put a ſword into his hand, the inſtrument of victory and domination.

And

And becauſe Shuddery was of a nature mild and conuerſeable, it was thought meete, that he ſhould bee a merchant, to inrich the common-wealth by trafficke, that ſo euery place might abound with all things, by the vſe of ſhipping and navigation: as a monitour to put him in minde of which courſe of life, he had a paire of ballances put into his hand, and a bagge of waights hung at his girdle, inſtruments moſt accomodate to his profeſſion.

Laſtly, becauſe Wyſe was of an ayery temper, whoſe conceipts vſe to bee more ſubtle and apprehenſiue, he was indued with admirable inventions, and was able by his firſt thoughts, to forme any thing that belonged to the mechanicke or handy-crafts man: For which purpoſe hee had a bagge of tooles or inſtruments, conſiſting of ſuch variety, as were neceſſary to effectuate the workes of his fancy or conceipt.

Thus you haue the firſt man and woman, and the progeny from them deſcending, according to Banians tradition; and a world to be raiſed of ſo few, the perſons (as they thinke) could not be better fitted to the ſame, the whole world being well conſidered, conſiſting of, and ſubſiſting by, ſuch four kinds of men.

The world being in this mayden puritie, that the generations of men might not be deriued from a polluted beginning of mankinde; the Almighty gaue not Pourous and Parcoutee any daughters, leaſt ſome of theſe foure ſonnes, preferring the needs of propagation, before piety and religion, ſhould haue defloured their ſiſters, and haue blemiſhed the world with impurity: but prouiding better for the holineſſe and ſanctity of our anceſtors, that the worke of generation might be agreeable to the worke of creation, God made foure women, for theſe foure men, and placed them at the foure windes, one at the eaſt, another at the weſt, a third at the north, and a fourth at the ſouth; that thus being diuided, there might be a better meanes for the ſpreading of their generations ouer the face of the earth; with which foure women how the foure ſonnes of the firſt man met, ſhall be vnderſtood in the ſequeale of their ſeuerall ſtories in the Chapters following.

CHAP. II.

Of Brammon the eldeſt ſonne of Pourous, his trauaile towards the eaſt; he meeteth with the woman appointed for him, the paſſages that happened in their accoaſt, their marriage, and peopling the eaſt.

THIS eldeſt ſonne of the firſt man called Brammon, grewe in ſtature, and had the preheminence of his birth, both in place, and in reſpect aboue the reſt of his brethren; as alſo in regard of his neere relations to God in religious ſeruices, was highly honoured of his brethren, and was an inſtructor vnto them; and the Almighty communicated himſelfe to him, in preſence, and viſion; he gaue himſelfe therefore much to reading, and conuerſed with the booke that God gaue him, containing the platforme of diuine worſhippe.

Being therefore growne to mans age, and (as it ſhould appeare by circumſtances) man being created in the middeſt of the earth, in ſome pleaſant place, where the ſunne at high noone depriued ſubſtances of their ſhadowes, (for it was fit that man ſhould be produced out of ſuch a place, as might be the nauell of the world) God who would now diſperſe the brethren from the center as it were, to the circumference, for propagation; commanded Brammon to take his booke in his hand, wherein was written the diuine law, and to direct his journey towards the riſing of the ſunne in the eaſt.

As ſoone as that glorious light of heauen had diſcouered his ſplendor from the toppes of the mountaines, he tooke his iourney that way (for the eaſt being the moſt noble part of the world, it was likely that had the preheminence in plantation) vntill he arriued at a goodly mountaine, before the proud face whereof lay proſtrate a valley, through which there paſſed a brooke, in the deſcent of which there appeared a woman ſatisfying her thirſt, from the ſtreames of the riuer; and they were both naked; innocence not being then aſhamed to publiſh her retyrements, and priuacies; nor hauing faulted ſo much with thoſe immodeſt parts, as to neede a ſhrowd to veile them from the ſight. This woman was of haire blacke, of complexion yealowiſh, or ſaffrony, as on whoſe face the ſunne had too freely caſt his beames, the remembrance of whoſe heate, was too ſurely conſerued in her countenance: ſhe was indifferently ſized, whoſe pitch could neither challenge the name of lowneſſe or high ſtature; modeſt were her aſpect, and her eyes Indices of ſo melancholly ſobemeſſe, and compoſed lookes, as if ſhee ſeemed to bee ſampled for him that met her.

But her eyes vnaccuſtomed to view ſuch an obiect, as was before her, hauing neuer ſeene a creature of proportion like her ſelfe, betwixt wonder and ſhame ſhee was vncertain whether ſhee ſhould flye, or pleaſe her ſight with ſuch a viſion. But Brammon no leſſe abaſhed at ſuch intruſion, which by retyring he could not well ſhunne; with a downe-caſt countenance ſuppreſſed with ſhame, they both aboad one anothers preſence, with tongue-tyed ſilence; whoſe backwardneſſe gaue incouragement to the woman to queſtion the cauſe of his coming thither: who anſwered, That by the command of him who had made the world, him, her, and all creatures viſible, together with the light that gaue them the comfort of their meeting; he was ſent thither. The woman to whom God had giuen that vnderſtanding, to be capable of the properneſſe of his ſpeech, and inquiring further into this accident, ſaid that there was an agreement in their likeneſſe, and compoſition, that declared they had one maker; that it may be, he that had made them, and had his ends in their diſpoſall, had thus brought them together, that ſome neerer bond might make them inſeparable, from each others ſociety: and caſting her eye vpon the booke that Brammon bare in his hand, asked what it was; who acquainting her with the contents thereof, was deſired to ſit down, and communicate the religious counſels of the ſame vnto her; whereunto hee condeſcended; and being both perſwaded that God had a hand in this their meeting, they tooke counſell from this booke, to binde themſelues together in the inuiolable bond of marriage, and with the courteſies interceding betwixt man and wife, were lodged in one anothers boſom: For ioy whereof, the ſunne put on his nuptiall luſtre, and looked brighter then ordinary, cauſing the ſeaſon to ſhine vpon them with golden ioy; and the ſiluer moone welcommed the euening of their repoſe, whilſt muſicke from heauen (as if God's purpoſe in them had beene determinate) ſent forth a pleaſing ſound; ſuch as vſeth to fleete from the loud trumpet, together with the noyſe of the triumphant drumme. Thus prooving the effects of generation together, they had fruitful iſſue, and ſo peopled the eaſt, and the woman's name was Sauatree.

CHAP. III.

Of Cuttery the ſecond ſonne of Pourous, his trauaile, and the meeting hee had with the woman appointed for him; their conflict, appeaſement, conjunction, and the peopling of the weſt by them.

SVcceſſively the ſecond brother Cuttery, was by the Almighty conſigned to the weſt, about the charge of making men; ſo taking the ſword in his hand, that God had giuen him, the inſtrument, on whoſe edge lay the hopes of a kingdome, rowſing rowſing vp his courage, which hitherto wanted occaſion of exerciſe, from the heart and boſome of the earth, in which his youth had converſed, he turned his backe on the riſing ſunne euery morning, whoſe ſwifter courſe ouertook him; and euery day in his decline preſented himſelf in his ſetting glory before him. As he thus trauailed towards the weſt, he chaſed with himſelfe as he paſſed along, that no aduenture preſented it ſelf, that might prouoke him to giue a probate of his courage; wiſhing that an army of men, or a troope of wilde beaſts, would oppoſe him, that hee might ſtrowe the ſurface of the earth with dead carkeyſes, and giue the fowles of heauen fleſh to feede on. And not knowing to what purpoſe God had directed him to bend his courſe that way, as onely ſenſible of his owne heroicke ſtomacke, hee ſaid: To what end hath God infuſed ſuch magnanimity into my breſt, if it ſhall want a ſubject whereon to worke my glory and renowne? ſhall I loſe the end of my creation? God forbid.

Thus carried on with the hopes of ſome aduenture, hee intended that whatſoeuer ſhould firſt cope with him, ſhould haue the ſenſe of his fury; when being come to a mountaine, whoſe height might make things far diſtant viſible to the eye, he might perceiue a creature of goodly perſonage, like himſelfe, ſtalking forward with a martiall ſteppe, no leſſe ſlowe then maieſticke in pace; which two approaching, as deſirous to make experiment of each others fortitude vpon their meeting together; it appeared to bee a woman, whoſe treſſes in a comely ſertility hung downe by her ſhoulders, which by motion of the ayre, turned into a careleſſe diſorder, euery blaſt that made an alteration in the ſame, gaue a new grace to her excellent perſon, and made her preſence more full of majeſty. In her right hand ſhee bare a Chuckercy, which is an inſtrument of a round forme, and ſharpe edged in the ſuperficies thereof, ſo accommodate for offence, that by a hole in the middeſt thereof, being whirled about the finger, and flung off, in the quickneſſe of his motion, it is able to deliuer or conuey death to a farre remote enemy. Courage diſplayed his banner in her countenance, and maieſticke fury ſparkled in her eyes, bearing witneſſe how much ſhe thirſted after conqueſt, and the womans name was Toddicaſtree.

In the firſt encounter ſhe made her Chuckerey beare the meſſage of her diſpleaſure, giuing entertainement with the inſtrument of battell, which was ſuch as Cuttery expected: and no kinder behauiour did hee intend to proffer, as preferring the harſh effects of violence, before the mollifying power of beauty; with this hard greeting did they paſſe the firſt day, giuing wounds on each ſide, ſhee with her Chuckerey, he with his ſword; both being much ſpent in the conflict, and often breathing when extreamity of exerciſe had languiſhed their powers, they renewed their battell by freſh aggreſſion and onſet, till darkneſſe did prohibit the vſe of armes, leauing the firſt day as an indifferent arbiter of the battell, neither of them able to boaſt of aduantage.

The light of the next day inuiting them to a new experiment of valour, they accoaſt one another, renewing the remembrance of their iniuries with ſecond attempts of violence: the day well neere ſpent in fight, Cuttery gaining ſome aduantage, with his ſword hewed her Chuckerey in two pieces, but fauorable darkneſſe looking with a partiall eye on the battell, and patronizing the diſaduantaged, ſhaded the woman with her broken inſtrument from the purſuer; by the benefit of which intermiſſion, ſhe conuerted her broken Chuckerey into a bowe, hauing prouided arrowes to requite the force of the aduerſary, by this newe ſtratageme, who was now bigge with the hopes of her ouerthrow.

The light being the beſt herauld they had to call them to battell, a third time they met, hopefull to conclude this ſtrange duelle or ſingle combat, which vrged on her ſide by her new inuented inſtrument; and on his by the thought of former aduantage gained, made the aſſault more vehement; making therefore her enemy the butte into whom ſhe meant to transfixe her pointed ſhafts, ſhe freſhly encountered him. But he perceiuing ceiuing her aduantage, whoſe power was to wound farre off, and his iniuries were moſt forceable in little diſtance, expoſing himſelfe to greater perill, that he might be owner of a greater aduantage, drew neerer, and in a cloze, exchanging the loſſe of weapons for hand violence; they thus proued their forces together, wearineſſe hauing abated their vigours ſo equally, that neither of them was ſo ſtrong to ouercome, nor ſo weak to yeeld, the ballance of victory ſo juſtly poyſed betweene them, as inclined with partiality to neither, it was fit the tongue ſhould conclude that warre, that the power of the hand was no longer able to proſecute.

Hereupon, in this doubtfull ſtriſe, Cuttery hauing ſeazed her by the treſſes of her haire to bring her to bondage; and exerciſe hauing put a freſh and liuely coulour in her cheekes, ſuch as in Cutteryes eyes, made her rather ſeeme louely, than one to be iniured; he ſaid: Oh thou wonder of liuing Creatures for ſtrength and beauty, why ſhould fury mannage ſo ſtrange a contention betweene vs two? If I ſhould in this combate haue ſlaine thee, I ſhould haue curſt this right hand, for bearing an inſtrument to ruine ſo goodly a proportion; and if thou hadſt ſlaine me, thou ſhouldſt but haue laboured with anguiſh of ſoule for thine owne diſcontent, and diſcomfort, who knoweſt not what pleaſure thou mayſt reape by my ſociety. Why ſhould one excellent creature ſeeke the ruine of another? will there not be one the leſſe? and thy being will bee nothing augmented by my diſanulment. Did God to this end conferre boldneſſe on vs, to make it the cauſe of one anothers perdition, who are both worthy of preſeruation? Surely courage in thee ſhall bee nothing impaired by my friendſhippe and ayde, but vnited vertues make moſt powerfull aſſaults, and are beſt muniments againſt iniurie. Beſides, the world now an infant, and of ſhort ſtanding, ought rather by all meanes to haue her iſſue multiplyed, then impayred or diminiſhed. Eſpecially ſelfeloue binds vs to ſtudy our owne preſeruations, to which ſince vnity did beſt conferre, he would not follow the humour of his high ſpirit to ſeeke glory ſo wickedly and unworthily, if hee might purchaſe that peace hee ſought by any reaſonable conceſſion.

The woman attentiue to the motion, proſecuted with ſo faire a carriage, after ſome pauſe of ſilence, and deiection of countenance, that gaue conſent to baſhfulneſſe: replyed, that though the markes of his violence were before her eyes, whoſe anguiſh were ſufficient to maintaine the fuell of further paſſion, yet in that he which had felt tryall of like rage, had firſt broke off violence, ſhee gaue ſo good an eare to the motion as the ſhort time of deſiſting might permit: affirming that ſhee was ſo farre content to ſuſpend ſuch paſſages, as he continuing that peaceable treaty, ſhould make his company acceptable, otherwiſe to renew the ſame violence as ſhee found iuſt occaſion of prouocation.

Thus with plighted hands, the forme of their new made amity, they became of inteſtine enemies, reconciled and amourous friends; till prompt and intelligible nature, apprehenſiue of her owne ends, through ſome longer conuerſation together, made them proue the difference of their ſexe, from whom plentifull generations were deſcended, indued with the fortitude of ſuch as are truly warlike. And thus the Weſt came to be peopled from theſe two, from whoſe enmities loue wrought ſo perfect and unexpected agreement.

CHAP. IIII.

Of Shuddery the third ſonne of Pourous, his trauaile, he findeth a mine of diamonds, meeteth the woman appointed for him, they become conioyned together, and by their iſſue, the North is peopled.

THE third Sonne Shuddery, which was the merchant man, according to his time and age, was ſent to the North, who taking his ballance and waights with him, the inſtruments by whoſe iuſtice he was to buy and ſell, tended thither whither the the Almighty had directed him. Hauing paſſed on ſome part of his way, (as buſie nature loues to be in imployment) hee deſired hee might meete with ſome affaire or buſineſſe, ſuiting with his traffiking diſpoſition.

And being come to a goodly mountaine, called Stachalla, there fell immoderate and exceſſiue raines, he ſheltring himſelfe in ſome hollow place of the mountaine, till the foule weather was paſt, vpon which there followed a cleareneſſe of the skies, but ſuch a deluge ſucceeded vpon the fall of thoſe waters, that his iourney was prohibited; for the riuers not able to containe the ſtreames that had in rowling currents from the tops of the ſteepe mountaines, deuolued into their channels belowe, began to make breaches in their bankes; and returning their burthen into the lower grounds, had turned the valley of Stachalla, into a broad riuer vnpaſſable. Shuddery therefore reſted in the hollow of this mountaine, till the weather might be more propitious to his trauaile intended: when in ſome days the faire weather had made the thirſty earth to drinke vp part of the waters, the ſunne to dry vp the other part, and ſome were leſt to inherit the lower grounds, ſo that the way being free for him ouer the valley, he paſſed on; but in the bottome of the valley, he found certaine pearle ſhels, that had their pretious treaſure within, which diuiding to bee made capable of their contents, he found in them, that which contented his eyes with their ſhining, and promiſed in their beauties ſomething worth the prizing and preſeruation (though he was as yet altogether ignorant of their worth and value:) ſo folding them vp he renewed his trauaile, till he came to a mountaine on the other ſide of the valley, where the mountaine, hee, and darke night, met all together.

But as if the pearles had but borne the meſſage to him of a greater fortune, a rocke or mine of diamonds diſcouered it ſelfe to his ſight, which the late waſhing of the waues, had beene as a midwife to bring to light, as if it had beene vnfit ſo great riches ſhould bee treaſured vp in darkneſſe, in the armes of ſo courſe an element; which myne taking aduantage by the darkneſſe of the heavens, the better to ſet of his ſparkling luſtre, ſeemed to inuite Shuddery to come and take knowledge of its admirable ſhining, who ſuppoſing it to be fire, began to moone the looſe ſparkles of the ſame, but perceiuing their glory nothing to decreaſe by their motion, grew enkindled with a great deſire to proue the ſtrangeneſſe of the accident, by the touching of his finger: but the darkneſſe and his vnacquaintance with the thing, rather begetting admiration, then right information of his knowledge; (ſince it had the light of fire, but wanted the heate) he was content with a patient aboade to awaite the dayes light, to giue him better inſtruction concerning theſe myſteries; which no ſooner appeared, but theſe diamonds concealed their glory, affoording only a wateriſh coloured beauty to the eye. The diſannulment of this luſtre amazed him as much, as the preſentation thereof made him admire. But deſirous to haue this excellency made knowne to mankinde, that ſeemed ſo wonderfull to himſelfe, hee carried ſo great a quantity of the diamonds with him, as might be no impediment to him in the bearing, taking a remarkeable obſeruation of the place, that hee might thereunto repayre vpon better proofe of the diamonds excellence and worth.

Thus Shuddery continuing his progreſſe forward, at laſt arriued where the woman to which hee was ſent, was wandering by the ſide of a woode, cloſe adioyning whereunto was an euen plaine, through which hee made his path; of whom when his eyes had gained ſight, and that ſhe preſented a perſon formed like himſelfe; he diuerted from his way towards her, to gaine more perfect knowledge of her: ſhe no leſſe filled with wonder and deſire in the view of him, yet ſometimes poſſeſſed with feare, ſometimes with ioy, ſometimes with ſhame, in the variety of paſſions, purpoſing many things, but really proſecuting nothing. Shuddery at length accoaſted her, whoſe approach ſhe receiued doubtfully, as if ſhe ſought a meanes of euaſion into the woode; at which he ſaid; Oh thou worthy creature, moſt like vnto my ſelfe, fly me not, who haſt cauſe to loue me, becauſe I reſemble thee; ſhunne not the conuerſation of him, that followeth thee thee not to giue thee diſpleaſure, but that hee might enjoy thy ſociety; things that haue reſemblance in ſhape, ſhould imbrace conſortſhip.

The woman then whoſe name was Viſagundah, perceiuing by the ſlowneſſe of his pace, that he rather ſeemed to be a ſuer to her, then a purſuer of her, by the retardation of her flight, witneſſing her contentment to ſtay, if ſhee might preſume of her ſafety, thus replyed to his words, That if ſhee could as much preſume of his good vſage, as ſhee was contented to behold him, ſhee would grant his requeſt; who giuing her aſſurance thereof, they entertained conference with each other, ſhe mooving the queſtion how it might be that they two could be capable of one anothers language, hauing neuer before ſeene each other; he made anſwer, That that God that had made them like in bodies, had alſo made them like in languages, that they might receiue the comfort of one anothers ſpeeches, and be acquainted with one anothers thoughts, without which conuerſation ſhould loſe the greateſt part of his comfort.

So receiuing ſtronger gages of each others loue, they continued together, hee not vnmindfull to impart the fortunes of his trauailes in finding of pearles, and diamonds, wherewith he adorned her, till they in future times became a cuſtomary ornament, as alſo acquainting her with the worke of the creation, together with his parents and brethren, they proued the comforts of the conioyned ſtate: from whom a generation deſcended, that became merchantmen, and followed Shudderies profeſſion, who with ſome of his ſonnes, did afterwards trauaile to the myne of diamonds by him diſcouered, and ſtored themſelues with them, which euer ſince haue beene merchandize of deere eſtimation; and thus the North became inhabited.

CHAP. V.

Of Wyſe the fourth ſonne of Pourous, his trauailes ouer ſeuen ſeas, his architecture, hee meeteth with the woman appointed, his reuelations touching religion, conſummation of loue with the woman, and their peopling of the ſouth.

THEN Wyſe the youngeſt of the foure brethren, went to the north, hauing inſtruments neceſſary with him to effectuate any thing that his well conceipted inuention could find out: therefore whatſoeuer was conuenient for mans vſe, hee had a braine to thinke and contriue; that ſo the needes of the world might be ſerued by the deuiſes of his ingenious fancy or conceipt. Thus he became the originall of the handy-craſts; for hee knew how to reare the buildings of townes, cities, or caſtles: to ſet, plant, and till the ground; how to make all things needfull for the vſe of man; which various diſpoſition of his to mediate things for mans conuenience, gaue him the name of Viskermah, which is as much as the handſman, becauſe he could do any thing to bee done by the hand.

Being indued with a genius fit for plantations, he (directed by God) trauailed towards the ſouth, where he met with ſeuen ſeas, all which he paſſed ouer, framing a veſſell for his conuoy, and leauing in euery place teſtimonies of his ingenuity; and paſſing ouer the laſt called Paſhcurbatee, he came to the land called Derpe, there by the ſea ſide he built him a faire houſe of ſuch timber as grew by the place, hauing engines of art, to reare vp timber. Thus hauing made a comely habitation, with roomes lightſome, and broad tarraſſes or rooſes aloft, for pleaſure and proſpect delightfull, where he might ſometimes pleaſe his eyes with the rowling ſea, which with renewed aſſaults ſmote againſt the bankes of the ſhoare, and directing his ſight the other way might behold the pleaſant woods and fieldes, he thus for a time ſolaced himſelfe after tedious trauaile.

But

But not long had hee tooke ſuch comfort as his ſolitary condition could affoord him, but the woman appointed for him wandering through the woods to the ſea ſide, and paſſing along the ſhoare thereof, ſet her eyes vpon this new edifice; and hauing neuer beheld any before, the rarity of it drew her neerer to ſatisfie her admiration with the view of the ſame: on whom Wyſe chancing to caſt his eye, as ſhee thus came to looke on his habitation, he deſcended to take a fuller contemplation of her beauty, whoſe feature deſerued his better nottice; for ſhee was of body amiably white, and her treſſes were ſcattered with poudered ſaunders, and other odors, the ſcent of which the blaſts of the winde diſperſed in ſuch manner, that he became partaker of them by his approach, which enkindled his ſenſes with new deſires, to be neerer her, who at ſuch diſtance gaue him a ſmell of ſo great ſweetneſſe: whoſe approach ſtrucke her into a bluſh, but her ſhame giuing place, ſhe moued the queſtion to him, How he came to that place where ſhe only had liued, to interupt her in her free walkes and wanderings? He made anſwer, That God the maker of light, that makes all obiects viſible, had ſent him thither to admire her excellency, which was ſo rare, that it was not fit it ſhould bee ſhaded in a place ſo ſolitary, but had reſerued it as a bleſſing for his eyes to view and admire: and becauſe it was pitty deſolation and lonelyneſſe ſhould bee a waſter and obſcurer of ſuch louelyneſſe, hee had with hazard of his life aduentured ouer ſeuen ſeas, to be bleſt with the enioyment thereof; a labour and trauaile worthy of ſo rich a recompence, and a worthy recompence and ſatisfaction for ſuch a labour: intreated her therefore, to accept of ſuch a bleſſing as God had prouided for her by his ſociety.

But ſhe that could not be brought to thinke of a courſe of life different from her former, told him that in his abſence ſhee found no need of his preſence, neither did ſhe at that preſent ſtand inclined to accept of his motion; that therefore he would leaue her to the liberty of her own free diſpoſe. He loath to loſe the happineſſe of his eyes, importuned her to view the roomes of his building, as if he meant to wooe her with the faire workes of his handes: but ſhe taking his importunity in euill part, told him, that if hee deſired her not to ſhunne the place, hee would diſmiſſe her freely. So turning from him with ſome diſpleaſure, becauſe ſhee was by him unwillingly detained, ſhe fled from him with coye diſtaſte, he almoſt expiring with the ſadneſſe of her departure, whoſe preſence he could not purchaſe and his pleaſure therein without her anger.

She hauing rob'd his eyes of that ſight, that they would neuer willingly haue loſt, hee committed himſelfe to the racke of penſiue meditations, broke the quiet ſlumbers of repoſe, thinking darkneſſe vnfauorable to him that ſuſpended and prorogued the chearfull day from his appearance, in which hee might renew his viſitations of her. So trauerſing the woods to and fro, he at laſt came into a valley, where he found her cropping the flowers, and gratifying her ſenſes with their ſeuerall odours; on whom intruding ere ſhee well perceiued, he ſaid: Oh ſweeter than all flowers or ſcents that the field can boaſt of, whoſe louelineſſe hath drawne me to make proffer of new kindneſſe, fly me not who haſt had a former tryall of my behauiour towards thee. So bearing with his preſence, he tooke occaſion to make knowne to her the creation of the world, and the parents from whence he was deſcended, the diſperſing of his brethren into the ſeuerall parts of the world, the hardneſſe and hazard of his voyages, the qualities with which he was indued, and the ſeuerall monuments of his art, which hee had left in the places where hee had beene. Further, he conceiued that the power aboue had not prompted him with the iopardy of a thouſand liues to cut a path through ſeuen ragged ſeas in a floating habitation, but euen to that end that the bitterneſſe of all thoſe euils might be ſweetned by his enioyment of her.

She deſirous to breake off this ſpeech, as vngratefull to her eares, turned backe this diſcourſe, deſiring him to take his contentments elſewhere, then in queſt after her; that if ſhe could preuaile with him in any requeſt, it ſhould be in this, to leaue her, and neuer neuer after to diſturbe her with ſuch motions. So both departed, ſhe in diſdaine, he in ſadneſſe and ſorrow, for ſuch diſmiſſion: giuing him onely this as a doubtfull comfort at their parting, that if ſhe found her ſelfe inclined to his ſocietty, ſhe knew where to finde him, and to manifeſt to him ſuch alteration.

Vpon this hauing left the place that contained his bliſſe, with oppreſſed thoughts, he was no ſooner got into a priuate place that might ſeeme as counſell keeper to his paſſions, but hee humbled himſelfe vnder the greene trees, and ſaid; Oh thou to whom belongs the acknowledgement of my being, I haue by thy guidance forſaken the ſociety of my parents. whom I know not whether I ſhall euer behold againe, as alſo the fellowſhip of my brethren; I haue coped with as many hazards as can make trauaile bitter and diſcomfortable, I haue left company to come into ſolitude; nay, which is worſe, to behold one that might giue me the wiſhed comforts of ſociety, by her refuſall to adde degrees to my ſorrow. Oh make not voide the ende of my being! giue not ſuch an euill recompence to my aduentures, bury not all theſe qualities thou haſt put in this eſſence, by this one diſaſter: witneſſe oh ye heauens, vnder whoſe azured rooſe I now am, the ſorrow I ſuffer, and witneſſe oh ye greene trees, that if you were ſenſible of my complaint, would ſpend your ſelues in gummy teares, what agony perplexeth mee. And if the maker of creatures ouerlooke his workes, let him now appeare and redreſſe the miſeries of his ſeruant.

With that a ſtill and quiet ayre breathed through the leaues of the trees, and a voyce iſſued thereupon, and ſaid, What requireſt thou, oh thou ſon of Pourous? And Wyſe made anſwer, that he onely deſired that the woman with whom he had met, might affoord him the comforts of ſociety in the copulations of marriage; which requeſt was granted on theſe iniunctions, that he ſhould erect pagods for Gods worſhippe, and adore images vnder greene trees, becauſe God had vnder them manifeſted himſelfe by viſion to him.

So Ieiunogundah, (for ſo was the woman called) feeling the motions of affection to renewe in her, at the next meeting gaue ſuch expreſſions of loue to Wyſe, as fully accompliſhed his demaund: ſo conuerſing together, they made good the nuptial ends, in a fruitfull generation. So the South as the other parts of the world became inhabited.

CHAP. VI.

Of the meeting together of the foure brethren at the place of their birth; their diuiſions and diſſentions, the great euils amongſt their generations bringing a flood which deſtroyeth them, and ſo the firſt age of the world concludeth.

EVERY thing by naturall motion paſſeth to his owne place; ſo the brethren hauing peopled the world in theſe foure parts, turne their courſe to the place where they firſt breathed their vitall ayre; for Brammon hauing peopled the eaſt, with all ſuch as was of his caſt or tribe, was carried with a naturall deſire to go and conclude his dayes, where he began, and to poſſeſſe the people of that place with the true forme of diuine worſhippe, that ſo all the world might retaine one vniformity of religion, not rending Gods worſhip into parts with the factions of vnſetled opinions, as alſo not willing to loſe ſo great a ioy as his eies ſhould conuey unto him in the ſight of his parents and his brethren, to the former of which religion had enioyned him, to the latter all the expreſſions of a brothers loue.

Cuttery

Cuttery alſo the next that had accompliſht the end of his trauaile, began to long after the ſight of the place that brought him forth, that he might there to his father, mother, and brethren, ſhew the bleſſings of God, in his wife and progeny, and acquaint them with the ſtory of his occurencies, and leaue a race of ſouldiers there alſo in his poſterity.

Shuddery turned alſo by the ſame inclination, had his deſires bent to his birth-place, being bigge with the eminency of his accidentall fortunes, which had loſt their greatneſſe, if his parents and brethren had loſt the knowledge of them, to feede which humour, as accompanied with other reſpects, formerly mentioned, drew him to giue his appearance amongſt the reſt.

Laſtly, Wyſe to communicate his arts, whoſe aduenturous trauaile was no leſſe memorable than the reſt, tranſporting his ſonnes and daughters ouer the ſeuerall ſeas, left them in ſeuerall places, and repaired to his birth-place, to pay his duty to his parents, and his loue to his brethren.

It ſo happened that God that would not croſſe any part of their intentions with euill ſucceſſe, did reſerue them to finde the happineſſe of their meetings in their ſeuerall turnes and ſucceſſions, as their works were in order accompliſhed, their ſeuerall arriuals being congratulated with feaſtings and triumphes, meete welcome for ſuch gueſts. It was not to be doubted but Pourous and Parcoutee, grew young againe, hauing ſuch a ſeaſon of happineſſe reſerued to ſmile vpon them towards the ſunſet of their age, ſuch as were able to make their forewaſted powers, ſpent with yeeres to renew their vigour: Euery one of them when their ioye grew ſtale, giuing a freſh renewance of gladneſſe, to their parents, by their ſucceſſiue arriuall. Neither could it bee imagined but that the brethren accounted that the bleſſed time that loſt all remembrance of trouble, which wee thinke too importunate a diſturber of our ioyes.

But ioy is neuer of long laſting, but after the paſſage of little time hath his abatement: this the brethren being ſenſible of, laid aſide the thoughts of their trauailes, and the remembrance of their late comforts, and as men newly tranſplanted to bring forth the fruites of their being in that place, begetting new generations there, that the world might bee compleately populous, and inſtructed in their ſeuerall qualities; by Brammon in matters of religion; by Cuttery in matters of rule and domination; by Shuddery in matters of traffick and merchandizing; and by Wyſe in the inuention of the handycraſts; of which foure caſts the world conſiſted, euery one of them liuing in his ſeuerall qualitie, keeping his tribe free from confuſion or enterfeering, and thus the world became peopled.

But multitude and concourſe that vſeth to be the nurſe of miſchiefe; for where there are many men there will be many euills, and proſperity, that makes vs forgetfull of our ſelues; and length of time, that renders to vs the worſt at our latter endings; began to confound all goodneſſe, and turne euery thing out of order. For Brammon grew neglectiue of his piety; and Cuttery grew cruell and full of vſurpation; and Shuddery grew deceiptfull in the waights and ballances, and practiſed coſenage amongſt his brethren; and Wyſe loſt his conſcience in his dealings, and became a ſpend-thrift, making the profits that came by his inuentions, but the furtherers of riot and exceſſe; and as they were thus euill in themſelues, ſo they were euill one towards another. For Brammon ſtomacked Cuttereyes greatneſſe; and Cuttery forgat to giue Brammon the preheminence of his birth, and as if his might had been ſufficient to giue him the right of priority, placing all excellency in rule and authority, condemned the ſtill and ſolitary ſpirit of his brother, as vnworthy of reſpect and eminence, yea prized his owne lawes and gouernment before Gods lawes, becauſe they came from Brammon whom hee diſeſteemed. On the other ſide, hee pleaſed himſelfe with the ſlaughter of thoſe that diſpleaſed him, layd taxations vpon Shuddery, and drayned the profit of Wyſes labours, and like a great tide made all runne along with his owne current, whilſt they requite his iniuries in coſenage and griping vpon their brethren in fraud and circumuention; theſe euils of example were ſeedes of wickedneſſe, that no doubt would grow in their poſteritie. And this diſſention among themſelues did boade a breach of that ſweete harmonie that concurred to the worlds firſt conſtitution.

Wyſe likewiſe ſeeing Brammon to loſe his reſpect, the more to make him deſpiſed ſought to bring in a new forme of religion, communicated to him in viſion, concerning the worſhippe of images, and bowing to pagods vnder greene trees, with other new ceremonies; which ſince Brammons booke contained not, the diſpute was great whether they ſhould be receiued as canonicall, but vpon Wyſes aſſeueration that they were receiued from God, they were receiued as part of the ceremoniall Law.

Thus euery day preſenting new platformes of wickedneſſe, and ſinnes that made a noyſe, God grew angry, and the heauens were cloathed with blackneſſe and terror, the ſeas began to ſwell as if they meant to ioyne with the cloudes in mans deſtruction, great noyſe was heard aloft, ſuch as vſeth to diſmay mortall wretches, and thunder and lightning flaſhed from the poles, ſuch as ſeemed to threaten a finall wracke to the earth; but as if the world needed cleanſing of his defilement, and pollution, there came a flood, that couered all nations in the depths. Thus the bodies had their iudgement, but the Soules were lodged in the boſome of the Almighty, and ſo concluded the firſt age of the world, according to the tradition of the Banians.

CHAP. VII.

Of the ſecond age of the world, begunne by Bremaw, Vyſtney, and Ruddery; of their creation, aſſignation to their ſeuerall workes, their time of continuation vpon earth, and the meanes vſed for the reſtauration of the world againe.

IT had now (ſaith the Banian) beene to little end for God to diſanull his owne creatures, for now his wiſedome and power muſt haue again layne obſcured; but though his iuſtice were ſo great that he would not let wickedneſſe goe vnpuniſhed, yet he would againe haue a world of new creatures, to whom his wiſdome, power, and mercy might be declared.

Seeing therefore the firſt age miſcarried by their ſinfulneſſe, (for whoſe purity God had ſo well prouided) the Almighty determined to beginne the ſecond Age by three perſons of greater perfection and excellency, then the other, called, Bremaw, Vyſtney, and Ruddery.

The Almighty therefore deſcending from heauen vpon a great mountaine, called Meropurbatee, vpon the top of the ſame the Lord pronounced his word, and ſaid, Riſe vp Bremaw, the firſt of liuing creatures in the ſecond age. The earth did then render from her wombe Bremaw at the voyce of God, who did acknowledge and worſhippe his Maker: and by a ſecond and third command from the ſame place, raiſed Vyſtney, and Ruddery, who with no leſſe reuerence adored their Maker likewiſe.

But God that maketh nothing without his vſe or end, did not make theſe to liue idle, but to be ſeruiceable in the worlds reſtoring; to the firſt therefore which was Bremaw, hee gaue the power to make the creatures, becauſe (ſay the Banians) as great perſons doe not their worke but by deputies, ſo neither was it fit God ſhould be ſeruile to the creatures, but giue them their being by his inſtruments. To the ſecond which was Vyſtney, hee gaue the charge to preſerue the creatures, for that as it was his mercy to cauſe them to bee, ſo it was his prouidence to keepe them in their being. But to the third which was Ruddery, hee gaue power to deſtroy his creatures, becauſe he knew they would bee wicked and deſerue a iudgement amongſt them.

Now

Now as God had giuen to theſe perſons power to doe theſe great workes, ſo it was meete they ſhould be fitted with meanes capable for the diſcharge of their ſeuerall charges. That Bremaw therefore might haue power to make the creatures, he indued him with the abilities of creation and production. Secondly, that Viſtney might preſerue the creatures, the Lord gaue all things into his power, that might tend to the preſeruation of thoſe that Bremaw ſhould make, therefore hee made him Lord of the ſunne, and moone, of the cloudes, ſhowers, and dewes that fall vpon the earth, Lord of the hils, and vallcies, diſpoſer of the changes of the yeare, the conferrer of riches, health, and honour, and whatſoeuer tended to the well being of man, and the reſt of the creatures. Laſtly, that Ruddery might bee a fit executioner of Gods iuſtice, God gaue into his poſſeſſion whatſoeuer might tend to the deſtruction of liuing creatures; therefore Ruddery was made the Lord of death, and iudgment, and whatſoeuer might tend to the puniſhment of man, whether it were ſickneſſe, famine, warre, or peſtilence, or any thing elſe that might bee a plague for ſinne.

According alſo to the ſeuerall aſſignations of theſe perſons to their particuler charges, they were alloted a determinate time of abiding vpon earth. Becauſe the worke of the creation was concluded in the ſecond of their Ages (which was a worke aſſign'd to Bremaw) therefore Bremaw was to be taken vp to the Almighty in the concluſion of the ſecond age. And becauſe the other Ages were multiplied with people by ſome that were reſerued from deſtruction, therefore Viſtney was kept on earth till he had doubled Bremawes tearme of time, as of whoſe preſeruation there was longer neede. And becauſe the world ſhould end in deſtruction, therefore the continuance of Ruddery was three times ſo long, that when the great day of iudgement ſhould come, hee might deſtroy all the bodies, and carry the ſoules with him to the place of glory.

Nought wanted now, but that they ſhould euery one in their ſeuerall turnes ſhew the powers conferred vpon them. So Bremaw conſulting with himſelfe, how he might fulfill the charge impoſed vpon him, grew extraordinarily afflicted in his body, the ſtrangeneſſe of which anguiſh vexing him in euery part, boaded ſome alteration or vnexpected euent; when loe ſuch trauaile as happeneth to women in labour ſeazed him, and a certain tumour and ſwelling of his body withall, according to the ſuddaine ripeneſſe of the burthen within, diſtended his bowels more and more, and gaue newer and greater extremities to him in this agony, till the burthen (though Bremaw farre exceeded the ſtature of common men) made two ruptures, the one on the right ſide, the other on the leſt; when behold two twinnes, the one male the other female, to wit, man and woman did betray themſelues to the world in full growth and perfect ſtature; who thus produced and informed concerning God by the inſtructions of Bremaw, the man was by him named Manow, and the woman Ceteroupa. So giuing worſhippe to God the Creator, and reuerence to Bremaw their Producer, with a bleſſing of multiplication pronounced vpon them, they were ſent to the Eaſt, to a mountaine called Munderpurvool, thence to diſpread their generations to the weſt, north, and ſouth; ſo they departed, and Ceteroupa brought forth three ſonnes, and three daughters; the eldeſt ſonne was called Priauretta, the ſecond Outanapautha, the third Soomeraut; the eldeſt daughters name was called Cammah, the ſecond Soonerettaw, the third Sumboo. As theſe grew in yeeres, they were in their ſeuerall orders diſperſed ſeuerall wayes, viz. Priauretta and Cammah to the Weſt, to the mountaine called Segund; Outanapautha and Soonerettaw to the North, to the mountaine Bipola; Soomeraut and Sumboo, to the mountaine Supars, all which brought forth plentiful generations. Thus Bremaw made man and woman, and repleniſhed the earth with the reſt of the liuing creatures.

Viſtney likewiſe did prouide all things neceſſary that might be to the ſuſtentation and preſeruation of the liuing creatures, that Bremaw had made, giuing them in enioyment of ſuch bleſſings as were needfull to a wel being.

To conclude, Ruddery did diſperſe afflictions, ſickneſſe, death, and iudgement, according as the ſonnes of men did by their wickednesſe inuoke this ſmart vpon themſelues. And this was the order God tooke for the reſtoring of people to inhabit the earth in the ſecond age of the world. Now how God prouided for the eſtabliſhment of religion in this ſecond age, that theſe that liued might feare and worſhippe him, ſhall be declared in the chapter next following, as it is vnfolded by the tradition of the Banians.

CHAP. VIII.

How God communicated religion to the world by a booke deliuered to Bremaw, the particular tracts of the ſame: the firſt tract thereof touching the morall law laid downe with the appropriation of the ſame to the ſeuerall caſts, and a confutation of the errours thereof.

GOD knowing that there would be but euill gouernment, where there was not the eſtabliſhment of his worſhippe and feare; after the world was repleniſhed a new, bethought himſelfe of giuing them lawes to reſtraine that euill in them that was the cauſe of the deſtruction of the former age.

Deſcending therefore on the mountaine Meropurbatee, he called Bremaw to him, and out of a darke and duskie cloude, with certaine glimpſes of his glory, he magnified himſelfe to Bremaw, telling him that the cauſe why hee brought deſtruction on the former age, was becauſe they did not obſerue the Inſtructions contained in the booke deliuered to Brammon: ſo deliuering a booke out of the cloud into the hand of Bremaw, commanded him to acquaint the people with thoſe things contained therein. So Bremaw made knowne the ſanctions and lawes vnto the diſperſed generations.

Of the contents thereof if any deſire to be informed, the Banians deliuer that this booke by them called the SHASTER, or the booke of their written word, conſiſted of theſe three tracts. The firſt whereof contained their morall law, or their booke of precepts, together with an explication vpon euery precept, and an appropriation of the precepts to their ſeuerall trybes or caſts. The ſecond tract vnfolded their ceremonial law, ſhewing what ceremonyes they were to vſe in their worſhip. The third tract diſtinguiſhed them into certain caſts or tribes, with peculiar obſeruations meete to each caſt or tribe: ſuch was the ſumme of this booke deliuered to Bremaw, of which particulars if any deſire more diſtinct knowledge, we ſhall propoſe the pith and ſubſtance of this in that which followes.

Firſt then the tract that containeth the morall law, and was by Bremaw publiſhed to the nations, compriſed in the ſame eight commandements; which are theſe following.

The firſt Commandement, Thou ſhalt not kill any liuing creature whatſoeuer it bee, hauing life in the ſame; for thou art a creature of mine, and ſo is it, thou art indued with a ſoule, and it is indued with the ſame, thou ſhalt not therefore ſpill the life of any thing that is mine.

The ſecond, Thou ſhalt make a couenant with all thy fiue ſenſes. Firſt with thine eyes that they behold not things that bee euill. Secondly with thine eares that they heare not things that bee euill. Thirdly with thy tongue that it ſpeak not things that bee euill. Fourthly with thy pallate that it taſte not things that bee euill, as wine or the fleſh of liuing creatures. Fifthly with thy hands, that they touch not things defiled.

The third, Thou ſhalt duely obſerue the times of deuotion, thy waſhings, worſhipping, and prayers, to the Lord thy God: with a pure and upright heart.

The fourth, Thou ſhalt tell no falſe tales or vtter things that be vntrue, by which thou mighteſt defraud thy brother in dealings, bargaines, or contracts, by this cofenage, to worke thine owne peculiar aduantage.

The fift, Thou ſhalt be charitable to the poore, and adminiſter to his need, meate, drinke and money, as his neceſſity requireth, and thine owne ability inableth thee to giue.

The ſixt, Thou ſhalt not oppreſſe, iniure or doe violence to the poore, vſing thy power vniuſtly to the ruine and ouerthrow of thy brother.

The ſeuenth, Thou ſhalt celebrate certaine feſtiuals, yet not pampering thy body with exceſſe of any thing, but ſhalt obſerue certaine ſeaſons for faſting, and breake off ſome houres of ſleepe for watching, that thou mayſt be fitter for deuotion and holineſſe.

The eight, Thou ſhalt not ſteale from thy brother any thing how little ſoeuer it bee of things committed to thy truſt in thy profeſſion or calling, but ſhalt content thy ſelfe with that which hee ſhall freely giue thee as thy hyre, conſidering that thou haſt not right to that which another man calleth his.

Theſe eight commandements are beſtowed amongſt the foure tribes or caſts, appropriating to each two commandements in ſeuerall.

First, Brammon and Shuddery the prieſt and the merchant-man are bound in greateſt ſtrictneſſe of religious obſeruance, and hold the greateſt agreement in their worſhippe; and Cuttery and Wyſe the ruler and the handycraſts man, do moſt correſpond in theirs.

To the Bramanes which are the prieſts, they giue the firſt and ſecond commandements, as placing the ſtricteſt parts of religion in theſe two things. Firſt in the preſeruation of liuing creatures from deſtruction. Next in abſtinence from things forbidden, as in the eating of fleſh, or drinking of wine; to which obſeruance they doe alſo ſtrictly enioyne the merchant-men.

Next, more particularly they apportion to Shuddery, as moſt proper to his profeſſion, the third, and fourth commandements, which two precepts inioyne to deuotion, and binde from cofenage in their dealings, a ſinne too incident to thoſe that are conuerſant in the ballance and waights, who are ſo myſterious in that particular as may well neede an act of religion to reſtraine them from ſuch fraudulency.

To Cuttery their rulers or magiſtrates, they attribute the fift and ſixt commandements, as knowing oppreſſion to bee a ſinne moſt common to the mighty, and inioyning them to charity, who are beſt able to relieue the neceſſities of the poore.

To Wyſe the handycraſts man they referre the ſeuenth and eight commandements, who haue neede of ſome free times of enioyment, yet giuen to lauiſhment of their getings, if they were not admoniſhed by their law; as alſo binding them from theſt, a ſinne to which they may be inuited by opportunity, as they diſcharge the duties of their callings in other mens houſes.

In fine, to all theſe they owe a generall obſeruance, but are more particularly cautious in keeping the commandements appropriated to their owne peculiar tribe or caſt.

Since then the lawes or precepts of any religion, are no further to be allowed, than they ſeeme to be well grounded, and to carry truth and good reaſon with them: Me thinks by the way, here is ſomething to be excepted againſt, in this Banian law, which diſtinguiſhing them from men of other religions, may bee examined whether it may haue allowance or no.

The principall part of their law admitting nothing prodigious to opinion, we paſſe ouer; onely that which commeth into exception, is that which is laid downe in the firſt and ſecond commandement, and is enioyned the Bramanes and Banians to obſerue, viz. firſt, that no liuing creature ſhould be killed. Next, that they ſhould not taſte wine, or the fleſh of liuing creatures.

Concerning

Concerning the firſt, that they ſhould not kill any liuing creature, the reaſon by which they confirme this precept, is becauſe it is endued with the ſame ſoule that man is.

This we deny, for the Banians here ſeeme to halt in their philoſophy, and the learning of the ancients, who haue deliuered, that there is a threefold kinde of ſoule. Firſt, a vegetant ſoule, ſuch as is in hearbes and plants. Secondly, a ſentient ſoule, ſuch as is in beaſts. Thirdly, a reaſonable ſoule, ſuch as is in man; which ſoule hath more noble acts to diſtinguiſh it ſelfe from the other two; as alſo that when the other doe interire cum corpore, periſh with the body, this ſuruiueth, and therefore is not the ſame ſoule, as ſhall hereafter be prooued.

But that this tenent of theirs denying the ſlaughter of liuing creatures for mans vſe is nothing ſoueraigne, may appeare by ſcripture, which after the flood declareth Gods allowance in this particular, Gen. 9. 3. Euery mooning thing that liueth ſhall be meate for you, euen as the greene hearbe haue I giuen you all things. Next by the cuſtome of nations, who differenced in other points of religion, yet hold conſent in this ſlaughter of liuing creatures; adde vnto this the practiſe of Pythagoras, one whoſe name they adore, and who did lay the ground whereon this ſecte leaneth, he killed an oxe, as Athenæus cuicteth, lib. 1. Dipnoſoph. in this diſtichon.

Inclyta Pythagoræ cum primum inuenta figura eſt,
Inclyta, propter quam victima bos cecidit.

Neither haue they beene abhorrent to this practiſe themſelues, if the report of hiſtory may be credited, for Cæl. Rodigin reporteth, that the ancient Indians (which are the people now in mention) when Liber Pater diſcouered thoſe parts, were cloathed with the skinnes of wilde beaſts, which were before by them ſlaughtered. Neither is this obſerued by the Cutteries now, and therefore may ſeeme to be a tradition of their owne deuiſing, neither from the beginning by them practiſed, nor by authenticke law enioyned, that it ſhould be an eſſentiall part of their religion.

And ſo we come to their ſecond commandment, which containeth in it two prohibitions to be excepted againſt. The firſt, forbidding to drinke of wine: the next, the eating of fleſh.

To the firſt, whereas the Eramanes and the Banians abſtaine from wine by a religious kinde of forbearance, at all times and ſeaſons, without the abſolute vſe of the creature; we anſwer, that this is a tradition voyde of ground or reaſon.

Firſt, it is againſt the common end and vſe of the creature, which God hath made to comfort the heart of man, obſeruing theſe cautions. Firſt, that men drinke not too much for the quantity. Secondly, for the manner, not in boaſting or oſtentation. Thirdly, for the time, that it be not when religious faſts require forbearance. Fourthly, for the place, that it be not where the vſe of the creature may bring ſcandall.

Next, thoſe that haue abſtained from wine, haue abſtained for diuers endes, but not preciſely obſeruing the points of this Banian iniunction. The Romans did forbid their ſeruants the drinking of wine, but it was becauſe they might not forget the bonds of duty towards their maſters. They did alſo inioyne their women to abſtaine from wine, but it was as Valer. Max. reports, Lib. 2. cap. 1. Ne in aliquod dedecus prolaberentur, quia proximus à Libero Patre intemperantiæ gradus ad inconceſſam venerem eſſe conſtituit: Leaſt they ſhould fall into defame, for that the next neighbour to intemperancie is vnbridled luſt. The Carthaginians forbad their ſouldiers the iuyce of the grape, but it was leaſt drowſineſſe ſhould oppreſſe them in their watch to a publique perill. The Egyptian prieſts called Sarabaitæ, did for temperate ends abſtaine from wine, but it was not for euer. That falſe prophet Mahomet, by his law forbad the drinking of wine, but it was a tradition and impoſture of his owne, and the very Mullaes and prieſts do do not obſerue it alwayes at preſent, as I my ſelfe haue beheld. The Leuites were forbid to drinke wine, Leuit. 10. 9. but it was onely before their enterance into the ſanctuary, that as Tremelius obſerueth, they might not deliuer the counſels of the Lord with a troubled minde, but know what was fit for their adminiſtration: this was no perpetuall prohibition. The Nazarites vowe was to drinke no wine, but this was not euer, but in the dayes of ſeparation, Numb. 6. 2, 3. The Rechabites vowed to drinke no wine, but this was arbitrary, and not by religious obligation, and not for euer, but for 30 yeeres, the ſpace betweene Iehu and Ioachim the latter, and Zedekiah king of Iudah. The ciuill abſtinence neuertheleſſe is not to be condemned, but this abſolute diſannulment of the vſe of Gods creature.

Againe, the confirmations of men moſt temperate doe condemne this interdiction of wine. Gallen called it the nurſe of old age: Mneſytheus allowed men laxare habenas, to looſe the reynes in merry and harmeleſſe potations. Rigid Seneca ſaid, though a man ought not by drinking to drowne his ſence, yet hee might by drinking drowne his cares. Plato that leaned to ſome of the opinions that this people hold, ſaid that wine was a remedy of God againſt old age, that a man might haue vſum liberaliorem vini, a more liberall vſe of wine; and others thinke, that Pythagoras did not altogether abſtaine from the Greeke wines. To conclude, hiſtorie reporteth of theſe ancient Indians, that they were φιλοινοι, i. e. vini amatores, louers of wine. Cœl. Rhodigin. lib. 18. cap. 31. reporteth, that at the death or funerall of one Calanus, there was a ſtrife or contention mannaged Ἀκρατοποσίᾳ, of healths drinking, and he that gained the victory, who was called Promathus, emptied foure great drinking bowles. So that this law prohibiting the uſe of this creature, was not from the beginning, neither is obſerued of all, and therefore ſeemes no prohibition worthy of obſeruance or iniunction.

To the ſecond prohibition, laid downe in their ſecond commandement, concerning the eating of fleſh, wee thus make our entrance.

Firſt, it is certaine, that theſe Bramanes or Banians will not eat of the fleſh of liuing creatures, that haue either had life in them, or the likeneſſe thereof; egges therefore come within the precincts of their abſtinence, becauſe they ſuppoſe the life to bee in the ſhell, by which they become hatched or animate; roots alſo that are red are abſtained from, becauſe they hold conſanguinity with the colour of blood. Neither will they cure their feauers by Phlebotomy, but by faſting, becauſe they ſuppoſe ſome of the life iſſueth with the blood. The reaſon why they would deterre men from eating of fleſh, is becauſe they ſuppoſe there is a kinde of Metempſychoſis or paſſage of ſoules from one creature to another, that the ſoules of men did enter into other liuing creatures, which ſhould make men to abſtaine from taſting of them. Which opinion of theirs, that it may appeare to bee vain, wee will ſhew firſt who were the authors of this opinion concerning ſuch Metempſychoſis, and how it hath had his ſucceſſion of maintainers. Secondly, what is the effect and ſubſtance of this opinion. Thirdly, ſhew the reaſons by which it is maintained. And laſtly, proceed to the refutation of the ſame.

Firſt, then for the originall of this opinion, though certainely theſe Indians are a people ancient, yet may it not be thought, that this opinion began firſt amongſt them. Firſt, becauſe hiſtory that is the light of times, affirmeth them to be ſlaughterers of liuing creatures. Next, becauſe Plato and Pythagoras that haue name for defending this Metempſychoſis or Metempſomatoſis, haue an honoured mention amongſt the people. It is likely therefore that they haue met with ſome of their writings, in this particular, by which they haue become knowne to them. Thirdly, becauſe Iamblichus with Chæremon the Stoicke, thinke it to be firſt maintained amongſt the Egyptians: That from the Egyptians then it came to the Grecians, that after it had beene riſe amongſt them, it was made more tenable by the wits and learnings of Pythagoras, Plato, Empedocles, Apolonius Tyaneus, and Proclus, and might in Liber Paters diſcoueries of thoſe parts, bee diſperſed amongſt this people, as well as by a ſcholler of Pythagoras who who ſpread it in Italy, where it found fauour with Numa Pompilius that ſuperſtitious Emperour, and was maintained by the Albanienſes, and Albigenſes, confuted by Athanaſius.

Secondly, touching the ſubſtance of this opinion that gained the patronage of ſo great ſchollers. They did hold, that there was a paſſage of ſoules of one creature into another, that this tranſmeation was of the ſoules of men into beaſts, and of beaſts into men: hence Pythagoras auerred himſelfe to be Euphorbus, and Empedocles in his verſe affirmed himſelfe to bee a fiſh. This made it an abominable crime to eate fleſh, leaſt as ſaith Tertullian in Apologet. cont. gent. cap. 48. Bubulam de aliquo proauo, quiſpiam obſonaret: Some ſhould eate vp the oxefleſh, that had ſwallowed vp his great grandfathers ſoule. This opinion gayned propugnation and defence by Pythagoras, and Plato, by this meanes; becauſe that beleeuing the ſoules immortality, it might gaine aſſent with others by this thought of its ſuruiuing in other bodies, after its relinquiſhment of the deceaſed, as Greg. Tholoſſ. affirmeth in his Syntax. Art. Mirab. lib. 8. cap. 12.

Thirdly, the reaſons by which they doe induce aſſent to this tranſanimation of ſoules, were theſe, becauſe the ſoule was impure by the ſinnes and corruptions of the body, therefore it was needfull it ſhould be ſublimed from this corruption, by ſuch tranſmeation out of one body into another, as chymicall ſpirits gaine a purer eſſence by paſſing through the ſtill or limbecke, diuers times; euery diſtillation taking away ſome of his groſſe part, and leauing it more refined. Again, becauſe it was meete the ſoule ſhould make a ſatisfaction for the filthineſſe it had contracted, by remaining in the priſon of the body, an exile from bleſſedneſſe a longer time, till this paſſage from one body to another had ſo purified them, that they might be fit to enter into the Elyſium or place of bliſſe.

Laſtly, in confutation of this opinion for prohibition of eating of fleſh from ſuppoſall of a Metempſychoſis; we maintaine that there is no ſuch Metempſychoſis, or tranſanimation of ſoules.

Firſt, the immortality of the ſoule wee euince without this Chymera of the fancy, by an argument drawne from mans diſſolution: this is the nature of all things that are compounded, that they ſhould bee reſolued into that which they were at firſt before their coniunction. Man is compounded of ſoule and body, the very diſſolution of theſe two in death declareth this, for that cannot be ſeparated that was not before conioyned. This compoſition was by life, and a creature without life, being in the ſoule alone, it is manifeſt that the ſoule had it before euer it came to the body, or elſe that which was dead could neuer haue liued by the meanes of that which was likewiſe dead. If the ſoule had this life before the body, it muſt needes haue the ſame after in his ſeparation, and by conſequence is immortall.

Next in confutation of their reaſons for this opinion: We anſwer, Firſt, that the ſoule is not cleanſed by ſuch tranſmeation from body to body, but rather defiled by that filthineſſe thoſe bodies contract, as water becommeth defiled by infuſion into an vncleane veſſell. Much more, ſince they affirme the ſoules of men enter into beaſts, which are creatures of greater impurity. Beſides, thoſe ſpirits that are ſubtiliated by ſtils and lymbecks, the fire is effectual to their ſubliming, but the bodies haue not the goodneſſe in them that may tend to the ſoules greater purity, in ſuch tranſmeation. To conclude, it is improbable the ſoule ſhould be enioyned to ſuch a ſatisfaction for ſinne, as tendeth to its greater defilement. Theſe reaſons therefore auaile little to confirme the ſoules tranſmeation in the manner premiſed.

We in the laſt place ſhall prooue this Metempſychoſis, to be no other then a vaine imagination, by the reaſons following.

1. Then, that theſoules are not deriued from one another per traducem, by way of traduction, appeareth by Adam's ſpeech to Eue, Gen. 2. 23. This is bone of my bone, and and fleſh of my fleſh: he doth not ſay, ſoule of my ſoule, and ſpirit of my ſpirit. It appeareth then, that though ſhee receiued her body ſrom Adam, yet ſhe had her ſoule from God. And this is that which Zachery affirmeth, Zach. 12. 1. The Lord formeth the Spirit of a man within him: whence Auguſtine ſaith, Eam infundendo creari, & creando infundi, That the ſoule being put into man was created, and by creating was into man infuſed; if therefore God created ſome, why not all?

2. Of ſpiritual things and corporal, there ſhould ſeeme the ſame manner of increaſe; but the bodies haue new beings, therefore the ſoules.

3. If the ſoules were purified by their paſſage from one body to another, then that man that had the ſoule laſt, ſhould be capable of all that knowledge that was enioyed by them that had it before, and ſo the infant ſhould be an experienced creature in paſt occurrences: but we diſcerne no ſuch extraordinary ripeneſſe of knowledge in one more then another, but that all our habits are gained by induſtry; which whilſt Plato would excuſe, ſaying, that the wandering ſoules did receiue from the diuell a draught of the cuppe of Obliuion, and ſo were forgetfull of that which is paſt; Irenæus thus taunteth him: If Plato had tryall that his ſoule was obtuſed with ſuch a draught, I wonder that he could remember, that his ſoule had loſt her remembrance.

Laſtly, if this were true, it would follow, that the ſoules of beaſts ſhould be immortall, which would be abſurde to thinke in theſe better knowing times. Hauing therefore proued this opinion of paſſage of ſoules out of one body into another to be a fancy, and nothing reall, this may bee no iuſt cauſe to detaine them from eating the fleſh of creatures, that haue had life in them. Neither would they, if there were great reaſon to the contrary, permit it as they doe in the caſts of Cuttery and Wyſe, whom if they pleaſed they might reſtraine by the like iniunction. All which thus euidenced, this already delivered may be ſufficient to publiſh concerning the firſt tract in the booke deliuered to Bremaw, touching the morall law.

CHAP. IX.

Of the ſecond tract of the booke deliuered to Bremaw, containing their ceremoniall law, in their waſhings, annointings, offerings vnder greene trees, prayers, pilgrimages, inuocations, adorations, together with the formes of their baptizings, marriages, and burials, cuſtomary amongſt them.

THE ſecond tract of the booke deliuered to Bremaw, comprized certaine ceremoniall iniunctions by them to be obſerued in the particulars following, the knowledge of which being ſomething materiall to ſet forth the religion of this people, ſhall be the ſubject of this preſent chapter.

Firſt, then they are enioyned to frequent waſhings of their bodies in riuers: the original of which cuſtome they ſay began with this ſecond age of the world, and was made a part of their worſhippe, to keepe in memory the deſtruction that was brought vpon the world, for their defilement and ſinne. The ceremony obſerued in their waſhings is this: Firſt, to beſmeare their bodies in the mudde of the river, the embleme of mans filthineſſe and corruption by nature; then walking into the riuer, and turning their faces towards the ſunne, the Bramane vtters this prayer: Oh Lord, this man is foule and polluted as the clay or mudde of this river, but the water thereof can purge off the defilement; doe thou in like manner cleanſe away his ſinne: ſo diuing and plunging himſelfe three times in the river, whilſt the Bramane iterateth the name of the riuer wherein he waſheth, called Toppee, with the names of other riuers in India, celebrated for

ſor theſe cuſtomary waſhings, as Gonga, and Nerboda, with other like riuers, the party ſhaking in his hand certaine graines of rice, as his offering on the water, receiuing abſolution for ſinnes paſt, is there diſmiſſed.

Secondly, they vſe a certaine vnction in the ſorehead of red painting, that hauing certaine graines ſtucke in the glutinous matter, is as their teſtimony that God hath marked them for his people; this is no other then to keepe in minde the memory of their baptiſme, which accordingly as the mark vaniſheth, is daily by them renewed, according to their waſhings, with the vtterance of certaine words accompanying the action, to put them in minde to bee ſuch as becommeth Gods marke.

Thirdly, they are enioyned to tender certaine offerings and prayers vnder greene trees, the originall of which cuſtome they deriue from Wyſe, to whom they ſay God appeared by viſion vnder a tree, as is formerly mentioned, with iniunction of worſhippe in thoſe places; ſo that the Bramanes vnder ſuch greene trees, erect temples to pagods, in which they giue attendance to performe religious rites and ceremonies, to ſuch as repaire thither. The tree peculiarized for this worſhippe, is called by ſome, as by Pliny, and others, Ficus Indica, the Indian figtree; and by Goropius Becanus, affirmed to bee the tree of life that grew in the garden of Eden; how farre forth to be beleeued, I referre to Sir Walter Raleighs 1. booke of the hiſtory of the world, part 1. chap. 4. parag. 1. 2. 3. where the more probable opinion is giuen. Certaine it is, that to this tree much is attributed by them, and they ſuppoſe ſome notable miſchance ſhall happen to that party that violateth or iniureth the leaſt bowe or branch of the ſame. It is a tree of fertill growth, whoſe branches be ſpreading, ample, and ſpacious, from whoſe boughes ſo diſpred, doe deſcend certaine ſtemmes, that rooting themſelues anew in the earth, propagate an offspring, and ſo dilate it, that it ſeemeth beyond the cuſtome of other trees to be capacious. To this tree when they repaire, they thither bring offerings, there they receiue vnctions, and there are ſprinklings of ſeuerall coloured powders; there they pay their adorations, which they number by the clapper of a little bell; there they pray for health, for riches, for fruitfulneſſe of iſſue, for ſucceſſe in affaires, there they often celebrate their feſtiuals with great concourſe. In which maygame of ſuperſtition to make further inquiry, would be but vaine and fruitleſſe.

Fourthly, they are enioyned to certaine prayers in their temple, which may hold ſome reſemblance with common ſeruice, were it purged of ſuperſtitious ceremonie; the ſumme of which deuotion, is the repetition of certaine names of God, dilated and explained, where alſo they vſe proceſſions, with ſinging, and loud tinckling of bels, which chaunting is of their commandements, with offerings to images, and ſuch like impertinent ſeruices.

Fiftly, they are enioyned to pilgrimages to riuers farre remote, as to the riuer Ganges, there to waſh their bodies, and to pay their offerings, that the concourſe of people repairing thither is great, and the golden offerings of treaſure and iewels throwne into his ſiluer waues, vnualuable; hee is likewiſe eſteemed bleſſed and purified from ſinne, that can dye with a pallate moyſtned with that water.

Sixtly, another portion of their worſhippe they beſtow in inuocation of ſaints, to whom they attribute the powers of giuing ſucceſſe to ſeueral affaires, they therefore that would bee happy in marriage, inuoke Hurmoumt; they that are to begin the workes of architecture, Gunnez; they that want health, Vegenaut; the ſouldier in his aſſault in feates of armes, cryes, Bimohem; the miſerable inuoke, Syer; and they that are in proſperity, giue their oriſons to Mycaſſer.

Seuenthly, their law bindes them to giue worſhippe to God, vpon ſight of any of his creatures, firſt preſented to the eye after the riſing ſunne: Eſpecially they pay their deuotion to the ſunne and moone, which they call the two eyes of God; as alſo to ſome beaſts which they hold more clean then others, they giue extraordinary kinde vſage: as to kine, and buffalaes, to whom they attribute ſo much innocence and goodneſſe neſſe by the ſoules of men entring into them, that they beſmeare the floores of their houſes with their dung, and thinke the ground ſanctified by ſuch pollution.

In the eighth place, touching their baptizings or naming of their children, the ceremony thereof is different in the caſt of the Bramanes, and other caſts. For thoſe that are of the other caſts, are onely waſht in water; then ſome of the kindred of the party deliuered, menaceth the point of a writing penne againſt the forehead of the child, with this ſhort prayer, That God would write good things in the front of that Child. All thoſe then that are preſent ſaying, Amen to that prayer; they giue to the Child the name by which hee ſhall bee called, and ſo putting an vnction of red oyntment in the middeſt of his forehead, as a ſigne that the infant is receiued into their church, and marked for one of Gods children, the ceremony is abſolued. But then the children that are of the caſt of the Bramanes, are not onely waſhed with water, but annointed with oyle, with certaine words of conſecration, in this manner: Oh Lord we preſent vnto thee this child, borne of a holy tribe, annoynted with oyle, and cleanſed with water; vnto which adding the former ceremonies, they all pray that he may liue a righteous obſeruer of the law of the Bramanes: ſo enquiring out the exact time of the childs birth, they calculate his natiuity, gathering by the poſition of the twelue ſignes of heauen, the chances or miſchances that may happen vnto him; all which they conceale, and at the day of the childs marriage, (which they accoumpt one of the happieſt dayes in his life) publiſheth the dangers paſt, and the coniecturall euils to come in the ſequeale of his life.

In the ninth place, concerning their marriages: It is conſiderable, that the time is different from the cuſtome of other nations, for they marry about the ſeuenth yeere of their age, becauſe they accoumpt marriage one of the moſt bleſſed actions of mans life; to dye without which, they accoumpt is a great vnhappineſſe, which often happeneth by protractation and delay of time; as alſo that the parents might before their death ſee their children diſpoſed, which commeth to paſſe by theſe earely coniunctions. Next for their contract in marriage, the parents of the children, doe prepare the way by priuate conference; the intention and purpoſe being made knowne, and betwixt them agreed vpon, then there are meſſengers and preſents ſent to the parents of the mayden to bee married, with the noyſe of trumpet and drumme, and the ſinging of ſongs in the praiſe of the perfections of the bride, which may truely giue her the merite of one worthy to be coueted and ſought vnto: which preſents being accepted, then there are gifts ſent backe to the bridegroome, in token of their acceptance of the nuptiall proffer, with like ſinging of encomiaſticks in praiſe of the bridegroome, ſetting him forth to bee ſo well compoſed, as may well deſerue acceptation. So the Bramanes appointing a day for the ſolemnization of the marriage, then there is a certaine ſhow, to publiſh to the whole towne this marriage intended. This ſhow is firſt by the bridegroome, who in nuptiall pompe attended with all the mens children in the towne, of the ſame tribe, ſome on horſebacke, ſome in pallankins, ſome in coaches, all adorned with iewels, ſcarfes, and pageantlike habiliments, make their curſitation round about the moſt publicke ſtreets in the toune, with trumpets and kettle drummes, and guilded pageants; the bridegroome is diſtinguiſhed from the reſt by a crowne on his head, decked with iewels very rich. And having thus publiſhed himſelfe: the next day followeth the bride in like pompe crowned, attended with all the girles of the ſame tribe in no leſſe brauery and triumphant accommodation, expoſed to view of the ſpectators. The day drawing to his decline, they repaire home to accompliſh the full rites of marriage. The ceremony obſerued in their marriage is, that they neuer are conioyned together but at the going downe of the ſunne, at which time a fire is made, and interpoſed betweene the married couple, to intimate the ardency that ought to be in their affections; then there is a ſilken ſtring that incloſeth both their bodies, to witneſſe the inſoluble bond of wedlocke, that in marriage there ought to be nodeſertion or forſaking one another.

After this bond there is a cloath interpoſed betwixt them, ſhewing that before marriage they ought not to make their nakedneſſe knowne one to another; this cuſtome they ſay was taken from the meeting of Brammon with Sauatree, who becauſe they were naked, couered their immodeſt parts, till the words of matrimony were vttered. So the Bramanes pronouncing certaine words enioyning the man to affoord all things conuenient to the woman, and charging the woman to loyalty in the marriage vowe, with pronunciation of a bleſſing of fruitfull iſſue to them both; the ſpeeches concluded, the cloath interpoſed, reſt away; the bond by which they were engirt vnlooſed, and after that, full freedome to communicate themſelues to each other. Dowry there is none giuen, that the driſts of marriage might not be mercenary, ſaue the iewels worne on the bridall day; and to the feaſt none repaire but thoſe of the ſame caſt. To conclude, in marriage they haue ſome particular legall iniunctions, by which the tribes are differenced: as firſt, that no woman may be admitted to ſecond marriage, except in the tribe of Wyſe, which are in the handycraſts men. Secondly, that men in all tribes are admitted to ſecond marriages, except in the Bramanes. Thirdly, that euery tribe do marry of ſuch as are of his owne caſt: Therefore the Bramanes muſt marry with ſuch as are deſcended from the Bramanes; and the Cutteryes, with ſuch as are deſcended from the Cutteryes; ſo likewiſe the Shudderies. But the Wyſes are not onely enioyned to match into their owne tribe, but into ſuch as be of their owne trade; as a barbers ſonne, to a barbers daughter, and ſo of others to keepe their tribes and trades from commixtion.

Laſtly as for their burials, this is their cuſtome; when any man is deſperately ſicke, and paſt hope of recouery, they inioyne him to vtter Narraune, which is one of the names of God, importing mercy to ſinners, of which mercy at that time he ſtandeth moſt in need. His ſpirits languiſhing, they ſtretch out his hand, pouring faire water into it, as the offering of his life, praying to Kiſtneruppon the God of the water, to preſent him pure to God, with this offering of his hand. His life being departed, they waſh his body as a teſtimony of his cleanneſſe and purity; this is the ceremony obſerued in the viſitation of their ſicke. After this, for the buriall of their dead: it is after this manner. Firſt, they beare the dead body to a riuers ſide appropriate to ſuch purpoſe, where ſetting the corps downe on the ground, the Bramane vttereth theſe words; Oh earth, we commend vnto thee this our brother, whilſt he liued thou hadſt an intereſt in him; of the earth he was made, by the bleſſing of the earth he was fed, and therefore now hee is dead, we ſurrender him vnto thee. After this putting combuſtible matter to the body, accended and lighted by the helpe of ſweete oyle, and aromaticall odours ſtrowed thereon; the Bramane ſaith, Oh Fire, whilſt he liued, thou hadſt a claime in him, by whoſe naturall heate he ſubſiſted, wee returne therefore his body to thee, that thou ſhouldſt purge it. Then the ſonne of the deceaſed, taketh a pot of water, and ſetteth it on the ground, vpon which he ſetteth a pot of milke, when throwing a ſtone at the lower pot, he breaketh it to ſheards, which rendereth the water to loſſe, and periſhing; the veſſel of milke aboue defrauded of his ſupport, powreth forth his humidity on the ground likewiſe, vpon which the ſonne thus moralizeth the action; That as the ſtone by his violence, cauſed the veſſels to yeeld forth their humour: ſo did the aſſault of ſickneſſe ruine his fathers body, and bring it to loſſe as milke or water, that is ſpilt on the ground, neuer to bee redeemed. The body thenbeing incinerated or burnt to aſhes, they diſperſe the aſhes abroad into the ayre, the Bramane vttering theſe words: Oh ayre, whilſt hee liued by thee he breathed, and now hauing breathed his laſt, we yeeld him to thee. The aſhes falling on the water, the Bramane ſaith: Oh water, whilſt he liued thy moyſture did ſuſtaine him, and now his body is diſperſed, take thy part in him: So giue they euery element his owne, for as they affirme man to haue his life continued by the foure elements, ſo they ſay he ought to be diſtributed amongſt them at his death. After this funerall ſolemnity, the Bramane preſenteth to the ſonne or neereſt kindred of the deceaſed, a regiſter of the deceaſes of his anceſtors ceſtors, as alſo readeth to him the law of mourners. That for tenne dayes he muſt eate no beetle, nor oyle his head, nor put on cleane cloathes, but once euery month throughout the whole yeere, on the day of the month in which his father deceaſed, muſt make a feaſt, and pay a viſitation to that riuer that drunke vp his fathers aſhes. Since theſe lawes and iniunctions, there hath ſprung vp a cuſtome amongſt them, that the women that ſuruiue their husbands, ſhould offer themſelues vp aliue to be ſacrificed in the flames with them, which to this day is obſerued in ſome places, and for ſome perſons of greater worth, though the examples be more rare now, then in former times, of which cuſtome Propertius thus ſpeaketh.

Fœlix Eois lex funeris vna maritis,
Quos Aurora ſuis rubra colorat aquis:
Namque vbi mortifero iacta eſt fax vltima lecto,
Vxorum ſuis ſtat pia turba comis.
Et certamen habent læthi, quæ viva ſequatur
Coniugium, pudor eſt non licuiſſe mori.
Ardent victrices & flammæ pectora præbent,
Imponuntque ſuis ora peruſta viris.

The Engliſh.

A happy funerall law thoſe Indians hold,
Where bright Aurora ſhines with beames of gold,
For when in fiery brands the husbands lye,
The women ſtand with hanging treſſes by:
And ſtriue who to their husbands firſt may turne
A body chaſt into the flaming vrne:
Whilſt to the fire they yeeld a conſtant breſt,
And with parcht mouthes, do kiſſe their loues to reſt.

But though Propertius maketh this to bee a witneſſe of their coniugall chaſtity; yet Strabo maketh the ground thereof to bee the Indian womens diſloyalty to their husbands; who in former times by ſecret meanes, vntimely poyſoned them, to enioy their paramours: The Raiahs therefore to reſtraine this practiſe, did procure the Bramanes, to make it an act of religion to interdict ſecond marriages to the women, and that after the deceaſe of the husband, the woman ſhould no longer ſuruiue, that ſo they might become more carefull of their preſeruation. The chaſter ſort, to gaine an honour out of the infamy caſt vpon their ſexe, did by voluntary ſuffetance remooue all ſuſpition of ſuch machination of euill, ſince they were ſo ready to cope with the terror of death, to confirme their loue: The ceremony whereof is this; When their husbands dye, they array themſelues in their beſt ornaments and iewels, and accompany the body to the funerall pit, ſinging all the way encomiaſticke ſongs, in praiſe of their deceaſed husbands, expreſſing a deſire to be with them: the body then being layd in the graue, the woman with a chearefull countenance imparteth her iewels to her deareſt friends, leapeth in to the corps, whoſe head ſhee layeth in her lappe; the muſicke ſounding aloud, the pile is kindled by the fire, and ſet on a flame, whilſt ſhe maketh herſelfe a martyr to approoue her loue.

Theſe obſeruances, partly inioyned by their law, and by themſelues inſtanced in their preſent practiſe, may haue beene ſufficient to giue you information, what might be the ſubſtance of the ſecond tract of the booke deliuered to Bremaw: what the third tract importeth, and how it is confirmed by their preſent manners and cuſtomes, wee ſhall glance at, in the following chapters.

CHAP.

CHAP. X.

Of the third tract deliuered to Bremaw, concerning their four tribes or caſts; their iniunction to follow that order of gouernment, and ſo touching the firſt of thoſe tribes, called the Bramanes; the deriuation of the name, their kindes, the number of their caſts, their miniſteriall diſcharge, ſtudies, and ſchoole diſcipline.

AFTER the conſideration of the ceremonies enioyned and obſerued by them in matters of their worſhippe, as it was the ſubiect of the ſecond tract of the booke deliuered to Bremaw: Now followeth the third tract, declaring in what manner of order or diſtinction they ſhould liue, and what was meete for euery one to obſerve in his owne particular tribe.

And becauſe there could bee no inuention more commodious for the gouernment of the world, then was vſed by the foure tribes in the firſt age, as to have Bramanes to inſtruct the people in matters of religion; to have Cutteryes that ſhould ſway the ſcepter, and keepe men in obedience; to have merchant-men that ſhould vſe trafficke and trade as did Shuddery; to haue ſeruile and manufactory-men, that ſhould ſerue the vſes of the world in the handicrafts, as did Wyſe: Therefore they were by this tract bound to keepe their owne peculiar tribe or caſt, and to obſerue what was proper to the faculties of each in ſeuerall; which accordingly was done, and is yet continued ſo farre as it lyeth in their power to conſerue this ancient forme of gouernment and policie: wherein if I ſhall ſomewhat digreſſe from their iniunctions, which for the moſt part preſent things leſſe pertinent to be knowne, to a more particular diſplay of their manners, I ſhall better diſcharge the parts required in this Tract.

The Bramanes then being the firſt of theſe tribes, ſomething ſhall be noted in particular touching them; and firſt of the name Bramane. Suidas is of opinion, that they are called Bramanes of one Brachman, that was the firſt preſcriber of their rites. Poſtellus, lib. de Origin. cap. 13. & 15. affirmeth them to bee deſcended from Abraham by Cheturah, who ſeated themſelues in India, and that ſo they were called Abrahmanes; the word ſuffering a Syncope, they in the tract of time, for breuity of pronunciation became called by the name of Bramanes. But they neither know of any ſuch as Brachman, neither haue they heard of Abraham, but affirme they receiue this name of Bramanes from Brammon, which was the firſt that euer exerciſed their prieſtly function, as they finde by record; or elſe from Bremaw, by adiection of this particle (nes) who was the firſt of the ſecond age, to whom the law was deliuered.

Touching the kindes of theſe Bramanes, taking them for ſuch as diſcharge the prieſtly office amongſt the people, they are of two ſorts: Firſt, the more common Bramanes, of which there are a greater number in India: or the more ſpeciall, of which there be fewer, and theſe be called by the Banians, Verteas, by the Moores, Sevrahs.

The common Bramane hath eighty two caſts or tribes, aſſuming to themſelues the names of that tribe; which were ſo many wiſe men or ſchollers famed for their learning amongſt them, called Augurs, or ſoothſayers, of ſuch a place of dwelling. Thus the prime of them was called Viſalnagranauger, that is, the augur of Viſalnagra, the 2. Vulnagranauger, that is, the augur of Vulnagra, a towne ſo called; and ſo of the reſt according to theſe 82 caſts to be diſtinguiſhed, being Bramanes of the diſcipline of ſuch an Augur.

Theſe Bramanes as they diſcharge their miniſteriall function, in praying with the people, or reading their law, have ſome peculiar iniunctions: As firſt, that they ſhould ſtraine their bodies into certaine mimicall geſtures, ſo as may moſt face the people to gaze vpon them and liſten to them; that they pray with both their hands open to heauen, as ready to receiue the things they pray for; that they pray with demiſſiue eyelids, and ſitting with their knees deflected vnder them, to ſhew their feare and reuerence. Next that they muſt neuer reade of the booke deliuered to Bremaw, but it muſt be by a kinde of ſinging, and quauering of the voyce, which they ſay was not onely practiſed by Bremaw, when it was publiſhed; but was alſo inioyned by God, that they might make his law as the matter of their reioycing.

The Bramanes are likewiſe the ſeminaries of diſcipline amongſt the younger ſort of that caſt, whoſe orders both in their initiation and entrance into that manner of learning is obſeruable; as alſo no leſſe in their confirmation, and ordination to the prieſthood: for firſt, about the ſeuenth yeere of their age they are receiued to diſcipline, being cleane waſhed, to intimate the purity of that caſt; then they are receiued naked, to ſhew that they haue ſtript off all other cares, to apply themſelues to ſtudy; then their heads are ſhauen, a long locke being onely left on the hinder part of the head, to ſhew that they muſt not forſake their ſtudy, if they doe, by that locke they ſhall be drawne backe againe. They are bound to a Pythagorean ſilence and intention, and prohibited haulking, ſpitting or coughing; wearing about their loynes a girdle of an Antilops skinne, and another thong of the ſame about their necke, deſcending vnder the left arme. About the foureteenth yeere of their age (if they be capable) they are admitted to be Bramanes, exchanging thoſe leather thongs, for four ſealing threds, that come ouer the right ſhoulder, and vnder the right arme, which they ſleepe withall, and neuer put off, but weare them in honour of God, and the three perſons, Bremaw, Viſtney, and Ruddery, and as the badge of their profeſſion; in which ordination they are enioyned: Firſt, nòt to alter their caſt or tribe. Next to obſerue all things enioyned in the Bramanes law. Laſtly, not to communicate the myſteries of their lawes to any of a different religion. Theſe bee the moſt of the principall things obſerued by theſe Bramanes.

Now for the more ſpeciall Bramane, by them called the Vertea, he is ſome man of the caſt of the Shudderyes, or merchant men, who for deuotion taketh this condition on him; hee is one that for his habit weareth a woollen garment of white, deſcended to the middle of his thigh, leauing the lower parts naked; his head is alwayes vncouered, as a witneſſe of his perpetuall reuerence of God aboue; they doe not ſhaue, but plucke off all the hayre on their heads, ſaue ſome ſmall remainder on the crowne; the like they do from their chinne alſo.

Of this ſort of Bramane there be ſeuerall caſts likewiſe; one is called the Soncaes, and theſe goe not to church, but performe diuine rites at home. Another is of the Tuppaes, theſe goe to church to pray. A third is of the Curthurs, and theſe pray by themſelues, without ſociety. A fourth called the Onkelaus, and theſe endure not Images. A fiſt called the Puſbaleaus, the moſt ſtrict of them all.

Theſe kinde of Bramanes haue a feſtiuall called Putcheſon, which is kept once euery month, by fiue dayes ſolemnization, but betwixt each day of the fiue they keepe a faſt; this feaſt is kept at the ableſt mens houſes, and commonly at thoſe times a penſion is giuen, to reſtraine the death of cattell, or other liuing creatures.

More ſtrict they ſeeme to be in many things then the common Bramanes, for the other are not forbidden marriage, theſe are; more abſtinent they are in dyet, for out of the former feaſts they eate nothing, but what is giuen them, and reſerue nothing for another meale. More cautelous they are for the preſeruation of things animate, for they will drinke no water but boyld, that ſo the vapour which they ſuppoſe the life of the water, may goe out. They diſperſe their very dung and ordure with a beaſome, leaſt it ſhould generate wormes that bee ſubject to deſtruction; and they keep an hoſpital of lame and maimed flying fowle, redeemed by a price, which they ſeeke to reſtore: They haue all things common, but place no faith in outward waſhings, but rather embrace a careleſſe and ſordid naſtineſſe. And this is ſufficient to note concerning this kinde of Bramane.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning the ſecond tribe or caſt called the Cutteryes, preſenting them in their flouriſhing eſtate, their declining eſtate, and their preſent eſtate.

THE ſecond caſt or tribe being the Cutteryes, had their denomination from Cuttery, the 2 ſonne of Pourous, who becauſe domination and rule was committed vnto him, therefore all ſouldiers and kings are ſaid to be of this tribe. That particular of Bremawes booke that concerned this caſt or tribe, contained certaine precepts of gouernment and policie, the knowledge of which being but of common import, I rather chuſe to omit, and proceede to ſhew ſome other things notable concerning this tribe, touching their ſtate or condition. Theſe Cutteryes may then be conſidered, either according as they were in their flouriſhing eſtate, or elſe in their declining eſtate, or in their preſent eſtate.

As they were in their flouriſhing eſtate, they were the ancient kings and rulers of India, eſpecially of that part called Guzzarat, and were called by the name of Raiahs, which ſignifieth a king, whereof ſome were of greater dominion than other, according as they were of greater force. Theſe Raiahs had principally foure men about them of eminency. The firſt of which were the Bramanes, who by ſouthſaying and augury did ſhew the kings what time was moſt meete to beginne their deſigns to proſecute them with ſucceſſe. The ſecond was one called the Pardon, which was a man of policy in the carriage of ſtate buſineſſe, and diſpatched all matters of iudicature, hauing reference to the king for iuſtice. The third was one that was called the Moldar, or the kings chamberlaine, who was moſt commonly preſent with the king, as the companion of his conuerſation. The fourth was the generall of the kings armies in the field, called Diſſiacke, who was ſent abroad about all expeditions of warre. Theſe were the foure that had chiefe eminency about the king. Furthermore, theſe Raiahs are ſaid to haue thirty ſixe tribes, as the noble families whence they were deſcended; ſome were of the caſt or tribe of Chaurah; ſome of the Solenkees; ſome of the tribe of Vaggela; ſome of the Dodepuchaes; ſome of the Paramars; that ſo no man of obſcure birth might preſſe to dignity, but being deſcended from ſome of the thirty ſix families; thus the Raiahs liued in their flouriſhing eſtate.

Now touching their declining ſtate: It is recorded in their Hiſtory, that one Ranne deuill a vertuous woman, did at her death prophecy the decline of the Banian ſtate, in the time of Rauiſaldee chiefe Raiah, the beginning of which decline ſhould be in his next ſucceſſors daies, which they ſay accordingly happened as ſhall appeare by the ſtory following.

It is then deliuered in their hiſtory, that there was a Raiah called Rauiſaldee, who had a ſonne called Syderayſaldee: Rauiſalde ſuffering the common change of mortalitie, his ſonne was careſull to expreſſe his duty to his deceaſed father, in a coſtly monument, at a place called Sythepolalpore, which being finiſhed with great curioſitie of art, and coſt correſpondent to that curioſity, being pleaſed with the worke, and deſiring to keepe his fathers memory and his owne laſting by that monument, hee conſulted with the Bramanes, to know whether that temple ſhould long abide, or if that pile of goodly workmanſhippe ſhould ſuffer ruine; by whom it ſhould be defaced. It was diuined to him by one Madewnauger, one famous in the diſcipline of the Bramanes, that one

Sultan Alaudin, a Patan, king of Delee, ſhould deface the ſame, as alſo gaine ſome great conqueſt in Guzzarat. Syderayſaldee hopefull to prevent the defacement of this temple, by ſome timely compoſition, diſpeeded his Bramane Madewnauger, and his Pardon, to Delee, to inquire out the ſaid Alaudin, and by a ſumme of money to procure the peace of his fathers bones, and the ſparing of the temple. But comming thither they could finde no ſuch man of any eminency, but another in the gouern-ment: onely by ſtrict inquiſition they met with a wood-gatherer there, who had a ſonne ſo called; thither they repaire to the amazement of Alaudins poore parents; They make knowne the reaſon of their comming, and finde the boy adminiſtring food to a young kid in his fathers backeſide. The Bramane propoſing to him the high ſortunes that ſhould betyde him in being king of Delee, and in the conqueſt of Guz-zarat, as alſo the end of their meſſage, that Syderayſaldee did greet him, and did de-ſire him that when thoſe things ſhould happen and he ſhould inuade Guzzarat, that he would forbeare to deface the temple and monument of his father erected at Sythe-polalpore, as a motiue to which fauour, Syderayſaldee did freely preſent him with a ſumme of money, which ſumme they tendered to Alaudin. Alaudin boldly anſwered, that hee was not in appearance capable of any ſuch fortunes, but if the heauens had ſo ſet it downe in their great volume, he could not alter it, but muſt lay waſte the temple, and in the maieſty of his nature refuſed the gift and treaſure brought him. His parents better inſtructed by their owne neceſſitie what was meete for him to doe, then his he-roicke diſpoſition would be taught, importuned him to take the treaſure, vrging their owne needes, and how conuenient a helpe it might bee to raiſe him to thoſe fortunes that were to him diuined. So apprehending the counſell to bee but reaſonable, hee tooke the treaſure, and gaue an Eſcript or writing, that albeit the heauens had decreed that he ſhould ſcatter ſome ſtones of that building, yet hee would picke them out of the corners thereof in ſuch manner, as ſhould fulfill his fortune, and make good his promiſed fauour to Syderayſaldee, in the ſparing of that temple and tombe of his father. By this money of compoſition, Alaudin gathered ſouldiers, and betooke himſelfe to armes, wherein he prooued himſelfe ſo reſolute, that hee gained great fame, where-unto his diuining fortunes became ſuch a ſparre, that he was made king of Delee, and after that made inuaſive conqueſts on Guzzarat, fulfilled his promiſe to Syderayſaldee in treatie on the fore mentioned buſineſſe. In which conqueſt hee ouerthrew many Raiahs, to the great ruine and decline of the Banian ſtate: But growing weary of this long warre, and many Raiahs flying to places inacceſſible, led with a deſire to returne to Delee his natiue place, hee committed the further managing of theſe warres to one Futtercon, that was his cupbearer; in this manner. For Alaudin conſidering how great he was grown from nothing (and that accidentally) he determined as accidentally to heape his fortune vpon another; purpoſing ouer night with himſelfe, that whoſoeuer did firſt preſent him the next morning with any gift, on him to confirme the gouern-ment of that part of Guzzarat hee had conquered. It ſo fell out, that whilſt this ſecret was lodged vp in the kings breaſt, that the fore mentioned Futtercon, the kings wine keeper, by the riſing ſunne, tendered a cuppe of wine to the kings hand; who ſmiled and looked favourably vpon him, and in the preſence of his army, confirmed him his ſucceſſor in the gouernment of that he had wonne, inioyning them all ſo to ac-knowledge him, and to doe whatſoeuer he ſhould command in the further proſecution of that conqueſt: ſo Sultan Alaudin departed to Delee, and the ſaid Futtercon did further inuade Guzzarat, and ſo did the reſt of the Mahoometans that ſucceeded him, to the decline of the Banian ſtate and regiment.

Now for their preſent eſtate, ſome of the Raiahs yeelded, others flying to retyrements impregnable, lay in the mawe of the countrey, and could not be conquered euen to this day: but making outroades, prey on the Caffaloes paſſing by the way; and ſome-times come to the skirts of their ſtrongeſt and moſt populous townes, hauing many reſolute ſouldiers

Souldiers to goe on in theſe attempts of rapine, called Raſhpootes, which implyeth as much as the ſonnes of kings; for being of the caſt of the Cutteries, it is like they were nobly deſcended, and ſome of the progeny of thoſe that were ouerrunne in the Guzzarat conqueſt. Of thoſe that liue vnconquered at this day, ſuch a one is Raiah Surmulgee, liuing at Raſpeeplaw; Raiah Berumſhaw, at Molere; Raiah Rammagar; Raiah Barmulgee, and the great Rannah, who hath ſought many ſet battels with the Moguls forces. This may be obſeruable concerning the caſt of the Cutteryes.

CHAP. XII.

Of the third tribe or caſt called the Shudderyes, of the meaning of the name Banian, of their caſts, and the forme of their contracts, in buying and ſelling.

THE third ſonne of Pourous being called Shuddery, and the profeſſion appointed him to follow being merchandize, all ſuch as liue in the nature of merchants are comprized vnder this name, and belong to this caſt: that which the booke deliuered to Bremaw contained concerning this tribe, was no other then a ſummary of religious aduertiſements, proper to the carriage of this profeſſion, enioyning them to truth in their words, and dealings, and to auoyd all practiſes of circumuention in buying and ſelling. What may be further worthy of note concerning this tribe (being thoſe that are moſt properly called Banians) at preſent is either concerning the name Banian, the number of their caſts, or the forme of their contracts of buying and ſelling.

Firſt, vnder the name of Banians is comprized either ſuch as are merchants only, or brokers for the merchant, for nothing is bought but by the mediation of theſe, who are called Banians, which importeth as much in the Bramanes language wherein their law is written, as a people innocent and harmleſſe, becauſe they will not indure to ſee a fly or worme, or any thing liuing iniuryed, and being ſtrucken beare it patiently without reſiſting againe.

Next for the number of their caſts, they are equall to the Bramanes, being the ſelfe ſame caſts, chuſing either to be vnder their diſcipline, that are Viſalnagranaugers, or Vulnagranaugers, from the peculiar inſtruction of which Bramanes they are guided in matters belonging to religious worſhippe, for being moſt likely vnto the Bramanes in their law, they more ſtrictly follow their iniunctions then the other tribes.

Laſtly, their forme of contract in buying and ſelling is ſomething notable, and diſtinct from the cuſtome of other nations; for the broaker that beateth the price with him that ſelleth, looſeth his Panerin, that is folded about his waſte, and diſpreading it vpon his knee, with hands folded vnderneath, by their finger ends the price of pounds, ſhillings, or pence is pitched, as the chapman is intended to giue; the ſeller in like manner intimateth how much he purpoſeth to haue, which ſilent kinde of compoſition they ſay their law enioyneth as the forme of their contract.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the fourth caſt called the Wyſes, the meaning of their name, their kindes, and ſeuerall caſtes; Bremaws time is expired, he is tooke vp to heauen, the ſecond age is concluded by the deſtruction of winde and tempeſt.

LAſtly, as the fourth ſonne of Pourous was called Wyſe, and was the maſter of the mechanicks or handy-crafts, ſo all manufactory men were to belong to the caſt of the Wyſes. Thoſe directions that were in Bremawes booke for theſe, were in precepts touching their behauiours in their callings.

This

This name Wyſe implyes as much as one that is ſeruile or inſtrumentary, for this cauſe, as it may be ſuppoſed, becauſe they are ſeruile or helpefull to ſuch as neede their art, as was Wyſe, and thoſe deſcended from him, who were indued with diuers inuentions; theſe people are at this preſent moſt ordinarily called by the name of Gentiles.

Which Gentiles are of two ſorts or kindes: firſt, the purer Gentile, ſuch as liueth obſervant of the dyet of the Banians, abſtaining from fleſh and wine, or vſing both very ſeldome; or elſe the Gentile Viſceraün, called the impure or vncleane Gentile, which taketh a greater liberty in dyet, eating fleſh or fiſh or things animate; ſuch are the husbandmen or inferior ſort of people, called the Coulees.

The purer ſort of Gentile, as they hold greateſt relation in their religious liberty with Cutteryes, ſo they agree in the number of their caſts, hauing ſixe and thirty, according to the number of the trades or profeſſions practiſed amongſt them. In the particular of their handycraſts this is obſeruable, that they make as few inſtruments ſerue for the effectuating of divers workes as may bee, and whatſoeuer they do, is contrary to the chriſtian forme of working, for the moſt part. Such is the ſubſtance of the third tract of the booke deliuered to Bremaw, concerning the foure tribes or caſts, ſomewhat accommodate to their preſent manners.

This booke comprizing in it the platforme of religion and gouernment thus deliuered to Bremaw, was by him communicated to the Bramanes of thoſe times, and by them publiſhed to the people, ſhewing what religion they ſhould obſerve, and how they ſhould liue in their ſeuerall tribes or caſts. After which according to the preſcriptions therein, the rulers did keepe the people in the order of gouernment: the prieſts or Bramanes did giue aduiſe in matters of religion: the merchants did follow traffique and merchandizing: and the handycraſts men did follow their ſeuerall profeſſions, ſeruing the needs of all men that had vſe of them; all things hauing a good beginning in this ſecond age, religion was embraced, prayers were made to God, and the three perſons, Bremaw, Viſtney, and Ruddery; the bankes of the rivers were frequented, and daily waſhings were not neglected.

But after the people were multiplyed, the ſucceeding generations were not of the primitive integrity, but the lower the times grewe, the worſe they were at the bottome. The Bramanes grew hypocriticall and lip-laborious; the Cutteryes, or rulers ſwelled with pride and ambition, cryed out for larger territories, meditating vniuſt ampliations of gouernment. The merchants grew full of fraudulency in their dealings. And the handycraſts grew idle and ouervaluing their labours.

In this vproare of vngodlineſſe, the Lord grew angry, and full of indignation, and deſcended on mount Meropurbatee, acquainting Bremaw with the wickedneſſe of the world, who deſcended and premoniſhed them of the iudgement to come, which a while huſht the cry of their wickedneſſe; but they fell to their old euils againe. Bremaw then interceded for them, but the Almighty would not be pacified, but took Bremaw vp into his boſome, the time of his aboad on earth being expired, that he might not behold the euils of the time to come.

Then the Lord made knowne his purpoſe of deſtroying the world to Viſtney, whoſe nature and office being to preſerue the people, did intercede for them: but the Lord would not be pacified, but gaue charge to Ruddery, whoſe office was to bring iudgement and deſtruction on ſinners, to cauſe the bowels of the earth to ſend out a winde, to ſweepe the nations as the duſt from the face of the earth.

So Ruddery enraged the windes in the bowels of the Earth, which braſt forth into eruptions, and the great body of the world had her trepidations and wauerings, the day ſeemed to change colour with the night, the mountaines and hils were hurled from their foundations, and as ſome report, the riuer Ganges was carried from her wonted rote, to runne in a new chanell; ſo the tempeſt deſtroyed all people, ſauing a few that the Lord permitted Viſtney to couer with the skirt of his preſeruation, reſerued to be the propagaters of mankinde in the third age, and ſo this age concluded.

CHAP. XIIII.

Shewing the beginning of the third age, the reſtauration of the ſame by Ram ; new euils bring a iudgement, concluding the third age by an Earthquake or Chaſma.

RVDDERY hauing reſtrained the windes from their former violence, all now was huſht; but miſerable and lamentable it was to behold the earth ſo deſolate and voyd of inhabitants, more miſerable to ſee the carkeiſes that were ſcattered on her ſurface, ſome blowne from the tops of high mountaines, others bruiſed to maſh, all ruined and deſtroyed; ſo that the Almighty repented him of his owne worke, and Ruddery was ſorry that he ſhould be an inſtrument of ſo great fury and deſtruction.

But becauſe the head of all the former diſorders was from the wickedneſſe and ill gouernment of the kings and rulers, therefore the Lord vtterly raced out all of the tribe or caſt of the Cutteryes; thoſe that were preſerued from deſtruction by the skirt of Viſtneys preſeruation, being ſome few of the other three caſts or tribes.

Now becauſe theſe foure caſts were ſo neceſſary to the worlds gouernment, that it could not ſubſiſt without them, though the caſt of the Cutteryes periſhed intyrely, for their wickedneſſe; yet that they might be renewed againe from a holier beginning, the Lord appointed that from the Bramanes the line of the kings ſhould be renewed. So the chiefe of the Bramanes that was then preſerued by Viſtney, was called Ducerat; the next child that was borne after this deſtruction, and which was the youngeſt of foure, was choſen to propagate the race of their kings, and rulers, who being religiouſly educated, might as well fauour piety as pollicy, and with holineſſe and prudence gouerne men in their ſeuerall tribes.

So he did many worthy acts, and exceedingly maintained religion, was a patron to the Bramanes, and churchmen, and his name was Ram; who became ſo memorable for his worthy deeds, that his name is made honourable in the mention amongſt them euen to this day, that whenſoeuer they meete and ſalute one another, they cry Ram, Ram, as a word importing the wiſhes of all good.

It is like that after him there ruled many worthy kings, but tract of time rendering euery thing worſe at the latter ending then at the beginning, brought forth ſuch as followed the courſe of the ancient wickedneſſe, and new ambitions, and new hypocriſies, and new frauds and circumuentions, and daily breaches of the law deliuered in Bremawes book, began afreſh to make intruſion amongſt them.

So the Almighty was againe angry, that after ſo many iudgements, the people would not be warned to his feare, therefore by Gods appointment, Ruddery cauſed the earth to open and ſwallow them vp aliue, reſeruing only ſome few of the foure tribes, as a laſt tryall for the new peopling of the world againe. And ſuch was the concluſion of the third age of the world.

CHAP. XV.

The fourth and laſt age of the world, Viſtneyes rapture to heaven, the Banians opinion touching the final concluſion of the world, and in what manner they ſuppoſe it ſhall be.

AFTER this, the Almighty againe commanded, that the world ſhould bee peopled by thoſe that were reſerued, amongſt whom there was one Kyſtney, a famous ruler and pious king, of whoſe vertues they have ample record, as being one moſt notable in the laſt age, which they thinke now by the courſe of time to be deuolued vpon us; he did wonderfully promote religion, vpon which there was a reformed beginning of goodneſſe.

By this, Viſtneyes time (as they ſay) being expired, in this place and vale of mortality; the Lord tooke him vp to heauen, there being no further neede of his preſeruation, for when this age is concluded, there ſhall be a finall end of all things.

But the Bramanes though they ſuppoſe time to be running on the fourth age of the world, yet they ſuppoſe this age ſhall bee longer than any of the reſt, in the end whereof they ſay Ruddery ſhall be rapt vp into heauen. Theſe ages they call by foure names: the firſt, Curtain; the ſecond, Duauper; the third, Tetraioo; the fourth, Kolee.

Concerning the manner of this finall iudgement, they hold it ſhall bee more dreadfull than any of the reſt, and that it ſhall bee by fire; that Ruddery then ſhall ſummon vp all the power of deſtruction; that the moone ſhall looke red; that the ſunne ſhall ſhed his purling light like flaming brimſtone; that the lightening ſhall flaſh with terrours, the skies ſhall change into all colours; but eſpecially fiery redneſſe ſhall ouerſpread the face of heauen; that the foure elements of which the world at firſt was conſtituted, ſhall be at oppoſition and variance, till by this agony ſhe be turned to her firſt confuſion.

And that the finall conſummation of the world ſhall be by fire, they gather hence; Of ſuch as was the beginning of the world, of ſuch ſhall be her diſſolution; but the principles of the worlds conſtitution, were theſe foure; earth, ayre, water, and fire; therefore by them ſhall ſhe be deſtroyed, which alſo they gather by the deſtruction of the ſeuerall ages: for the people of the firſt age were deſtroyed by water; the people of the ſecond age were deſtroyed by winde, which they accoumpt the ayre; the people of the third age were deſtroyed by earth; and the people of the laſt age, ſhall be deſtroyed by fire.

Then (ſay they) ſhall Ruddery carry vp the ſoules of all people to heauen with him, to reſt in Gods boſome, but the bodies ſhall all periſh; ſo that they believe not the reſurrection, for they ſay, heauen being a place that is pure, they hold it cannot be capable of ſuch groſſe ſubſtances.

The

The authors conclusion to the reader, together with a censure on the materiall parts of this relation.

THUS worthy Reader, thou hast the summe of the Banian religion, such as it is; not voyd of vaine superstitions, and composed forgery; as well may bee iudged by the precedent discourse, wherein, as in all other heresies may be gathered, how Sathan leadeth those that are out of the pale of the church, a round, in the maze of errour and gentilisme. I might leaue the particulars to thy censure, as well as to thy reading; but since I haue detected such grosse opinions in this sect, I cannot let them passe without a rod trust at their backes, as a deserued pennance for their crime.

To helpe thy memory therefore in a short reuise of their forementioned vanities; what seemeth their first age to present, but a figment of their owne deuising, to confirme them to be the most ancient of all people? as if like the Ægyptians, in the 2 booke of Iustine, they onely would boast of antiquity; and to lay the first ground of religion and gouernment, when the Scythians had better arguments to pleade than they. How fabulous and like an old womans tale seeme their deuised Medium for the worlds propagation, in placing foure women at the foure windes? And for the second age and the worlds restauration therein, if by those three persons, Bremaw, Vistney, and Ruddery, they glaunce at the Trinity, how prodigious haue they made that mystery; making it rather a Quaternity, than a Trinity? What a monstrous fancy haue they formed and shaped for the peopling of that age; and if they ayme not at a marke so sublime, what men shall deserue the attributes to them appropriate? Touching their law, the maine Pillars thereof haue beene demolished in its confutation: The kingdome of God consists not in meates and drinkes. For other their ceremonies and rites, contained in their second tract of the booke, what man of reasonable vnderstanding doth not wonder at their superstitions, which place their faith in outward washings, lotions, and sprinklings? in worshippe of sunne, moone, and other liuing creatures, in paintings, vnctions, and garish processions, in offerings vnder greene trees, in cringings, beckings, and bowings to images, and other multifarious ceremonies? all euidences of braines intoxicate with the fumes of errour and Polytheisme. As for their foure tribes or casts, as in all things else, how Pythagorically they stand vpon the number of foure; the world was formed of foure principles; diuided into foure points of the compasse; to endure for four ages; planted by foure men; matched to foure women; restored againe by foure; and to be demolished by foure seuerall destructions; in foure seuerall elements: and to conclude, like Sadduces denying the resurrection, in which consisteth the hopes of the blessed: of which St. Paul, 1 Cor. 15. 29. If in this life only we haue hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

All these declare how they haue made their religion a composed fiction, rather then any thing reall for faith to leane on. Though then the nouelty of this relation may make it gratefull to any, who like an Athenian desireth to heare some thing strange or new: I know not wherein it may be more profitable, then to settle vs in the solidnesse of our owne faith, which is purged of all such leuities; for the vainnesse of errour makes truthes greatest opinion, which duely considered may well moue vs to say,

Micat inter omnes,
Iulium Sydus, velut inter ignes
Luna minores.

That our great light outshines all these as farre,
As siluer moone outshines each lesser starre.

A. ROGER, A HOLLANDER.

PREFACE.

THE Brachmans, ſo famous in antiquity, were not only a ſect of philoſophers, but a people ſpread up and down that part of Aſia which now goes by the name of Indoſtan. The tenets of their wiſe-men, who were ſurnam'd Gymnoſophiſts, from their going almoſt naked, were ſo very near a-kin to thoſe of the Egyptian philoſophers, from whom Pythagoras borrowed the greateſt part of his, that we may reaſonably preſume, the Gymnoſophiſts of the Indies were a colony of the Egyptians, whoſe poſterity ſubſiſts to this day. The diſtinguiſhing tenet of both of theſe, was the metempſycoſis or tranſmigration of ſouls.

'Tis probable that the name of Brachmans, [a]Bramins, or Bramines (for writers have employ'd theſe three words indifferently) is derived from Brahma, which is the name of one of their legiſlators, [b] whoſe memory was long had in veneration by thoſe people, becauſe of the excellent order he eſtabliſh'd in the Indies; where, ſome have aſſur'd, his writings are ſtill preſerv'd by the learned of the country. But as idolatry is one of the ill effects that flows from the immoderate gratitude which mankind have paid to illuſtrious perſonages, who had done great ſervices to mankind; the veneration which they firſt had for Brahma, degenerated afterwards into ſuperſtitious fictions; and his followers, not ſatisfy'd with having rais'd him above all his cotemporaries, pretended he was more than man. They [c] imagin'd that God having made a reſolution to create the univerſe, began his work by the creation of three Beings, who boaſted the utmoſt perfection, viz. Brahma, who was to create the world; Beſchen, whoſe office was to preſerve, and Mehahdeu, to deſtroy it. Poſſibly if we knew the true etymology of theſe three words, we then might have ſome grounds to believe, that they thereby intended to denote, the almighty power, the providence, and the juſtice of God; which they might have expreſs'd after an allegorical manner, and according to the genius of the Eaſterns.

'Tis generally thought, that Brahma the law-giver, [d] divided the people into four caſtes or principal tribes. The firſt is that of the Brachmans or Bramins, which is the moſt noble. Out of this tribe only, all their ſacrificers, ſchool-maſters, and judges of the nation, are elected. The ſecond

[a] Methinks exactneſs requires that we ſhould call the whole nation Brachmans, and thoſe of the firſt caſte or tribe Bramins. However, as this is not yet eſtabliſh'd, we dare not preſume to make this diſtinction.

[c] Bernier's Voyages to Mogul, vol. 2. p. 139.

[d] Hiſt. of Mogul, ibid.

ſecond is that of the Rageputes or Rasboutes, who are educated only in the military way, and are employ'd in defending or enlarging the frontiers. The third are the Banians, whoſe only buſineſs is trade, in ſetting artificers to work, and in ſelling their ſeveral manufactures, by wholeſale and retail. The fourth is that of the artificers, who are ſub-divided into ſeveral others, according to their reſpective trades. 'Twas neceſſary for me to give this general idea of this people, in order for our better underſtanding the relation which the Banians have to one another, (whoſe opinions relating to the four ages of the world, may be ſeen in [a] Mr. Lord's Diſſertation) and the Bramins, who are mention'd in this place.

I do not intend to trouble the reader with a tedious collection of what the antients have writ concerning the Brachmans, or Indian Gymnoſophiſts, but ſhall confine myſelf wholly to the modern Brachmans; and, the better to avoid confuſion, ſhall divide this diſſertation into two parts. In the firſt, I ſhall treat of their tribes, their manners, and civil ceremonies. The ſecond will conſiſt wholly of their tenets, and religious ceremonies. But in like manner as a Tartar, who ſhould undertake to give his countrymen an account of the tenets and ceremonies of the Chriſtians, would be oblig'd to diſtinguiſh between the ſeveral branches thereof, viz. the church of England, that of Rome, of Geneva, and that of the Greeks; ſo, that I may not aſcribe to all the Bramins in general, ſuch things as may poſſibly relate to one particular ſect only, it may be proper to inform the reader, that the Bramins here mention'd, are thoſe who inhabit the peninſula of India, particularly the coaſt of Coromandel. The Reverend Mr. Abraham Roger, who reſided ten years at Paliacate, where he made exact enquiry into the lives and principles of the Bramins among whom he liv'd, has given us a very [b] valuable relation on that head, he himſelf being an eye-witneſs to what he relates. Tho' his manner of writing is harſh and uncouth, and encumber'd with a great number of uſeleſs remarks, I yet hope that the reader will not be unſatisfied with the extracts I have made from him, ſince I have [c] tranſcrib'd the moſt eſſential particulars from his work, and endeavour'd to give it in tolerable language; and whenever I borrow any particulars from other authors who have written on the Bramins, I ſhall take care to quote their names.

A DISSERTATION ON THE RELIGION AND MANNERS OF THE BRAMINS.

PART I.

Of their Manners and Civil Ceremonies.

CHAP. I.

Of the Caſtes or Tribes of the Bramins.

THE nation of the Brachmans is divided into four caſtes or tribes; to which we might add a fifth, but this is ſo much deſpiſed by the reſt, that they will not allow it the name of a tribe. The four principal are, the Bramins, the Settreas, the Veinsjas, and the Soudras. The firſt is more excellent than the other three, and has the ſame precedency allow'd it, as the cow above all other quadrupeds, in the opinion of theſe People. The Vedam, which is of the ſame authority with thoſe people, as the bible among the Chriſtians, or the alcoran among the Mahometans, will not allow the Bramins to be puniſhed with death for any crime ſoever. If any of theſe perpetrate any crime that merits death, the worſt puniſhment they dare inflict upon him is, to put out his eyes: for, according to their principles, any perſon who kills a Bramin, is guilty of one of thoſe five ſins, the forgiveneſs of which it is extremely difficult to obtain. And, on the other ſide, whoever has been ſo unhappy as to kill one, is by the Vedam condemn'd to twelve years pilgrimage, to ask alms, and to eat always out of the ſkull of the murder'd Bramin. The time of his penance being expir'd, he is to build a temple in honour of Eſwara, and be very liberal to the poor. However, the killing a Bramin who was going to war, would not be ſo heinous a crime, and a man would in this caſe, be abſolv'd for building a temple, provided he were rich enough to do it.

The ſecond are the Settreas, who are the quality of the country, and are the Rajahs or nobles: the kings are of this caſte, whence it is, that they take upon themſelves the title of Raja of Rajas, the noble of nobles. This tribe was antiently divided into two branches only; the firſt of which was call'd Sourivansjam, and the ſecond Somovansjam, both names borrow'd from the Samſcortan tongue, which, among them, is the language of the Literati, as the Latin among us, and in which,

Souri ſignifies the ſun, and Somo the moon. Beſides theſe two branches, ſeveral others have been form'd, who have degenerated by marrying beneath themſelves, ſo that the two former make no ſcruple to marry with one another, but they have the utmoſt contempt for the reſt.

The duty of the Settreas is to defend their country, and to ſee that the Bramins don't fall into poverty. The adminiſtration of all civil affairs is committed to them; but as they are oblig'd to live upon the income of their eſtates, and are not allow'd to have the leaſt dealings in trade, a great number of children is a burden to them; whence it frequently comes to paſs, that their children are oblig'd to ſerve the rich in quality of ſoldiers, in order to procure themſelves ſubſiſtence.

The Veinsjas are the third caſte, who are divided into Comitiis and Sitti Veapari, each of whom pretend to be the true Veinsjas. They ſubſiſt by traffick, and, like the Bramins, abſtain from every thing that has life; whereas thoſe of the ſecond and fourth tribe, eat fiſh and fleſh, that of the cow excepted, which they are all forbid to eat, in the ſame manner as the Jews and Mahometans are prohibited ſwines fleſh. I ſhall obſerve, by the bye, that this abſtinence from cows fleſh, is leſs the reſult of ſuperſtition than [a] policy. Oxen are the moſt uſeful beaſts in the Indies, and are uſed inſtead of horſes for travelling, carrying burthens, and drawing; not to mention the great benefit of cow's milk, as will be obſerv'd in the ſequel.

The Soudras include the common people. This caſte is ſubdivided into a great number of others, who have each their particular name, which is generally borrowed from their reſpective trades. The caſtes of Soudras have a mutual emulation among themſelves, and all endeavour to rival each other; and whoever among them obſerves any innovation, is ſure to oppoſe it. There is one among them which is recogniz'd by the reſt, as chief in dignity, viz. that of the Vellalas, ſome of whom are employ'd in the magiſtracy, while others ſubſiſt by ploughing. The caſte of Ambria, claims the ſecond place, ſome of whom gain their livelihood by ſowing, and others by attending upon the great. The Paliacattas are employ'd in maſonry. There is a caſte, called the Cauvreas, which conſiſts of a great number of people; 'tis alſo called the tribe of the three hundred, and is the receptacle of all ſuch as don't know to what tribe they belong. Some of theſe are in public employments, others are painters, callico-printers, or ſoldiers. There are a great number of other caſtes, whoſe names and uſual employments are as follows. The Sitty's are merchants, if they have any money to trade with, but otherwiſe they are porters and carry burdens. The Paly's ſell poultry and ſwine; ſome either ſow, or apply themſelves to painting, or embrace the military profeſſion, for which they were formerly very famous. The Tenea's are weavers; the Cottevaniens fruiterers, particularly for the fruit of [b] Piſan: the Illevaniens are fruiterers, and deal in figs, cocoa, and the Jagara or black-ſugar: the Sitticarams are merchants, whoſe kind of traffick differs from that of the Sitty's: the Caltajas are gold-ſmiths, lock-ſmiths, ſtone-cutters, carpenters and maſons: the Carteans, the Patnouvas, and the Macovas are fiſhermen; the firſt fiſh with large nets, the ſecond with leſs, and the third after a different manner. The Conacapules are writers; moſt of the Gurreas and the Bargeurras ſhepherds: the Riddi's, the Camavars, and the Bergaivilalas are moſt of them ploughmen; ſome of theſe are ſoldiers: the greateſt part of the Innadi's are ſoldiers, and very few apply themſelves to husbandry: moſt of the Moutreas go into the field. The tribe of Tolawa is extinct, and exiſts only in name. The Kaicules are generally deſpis'd, and moſt of their wives are proſtitutes, which never-

[a] The above-mention'd author of the hiſtory of Mogul, beſides this political reaſon, relates, that under the reign of Akebar, ſome perſon went up the Ganges in ſearch of its ſource, and that they fancied they had found it in a high mountain, which ſeem'd to have been cut by art into the ſhape of a cow's head. He adds, that the chief hope of the happineſs of the life to come, among the Indians, conſiſts in dying in the waters of the Ganges, and holding a cow by the tail at the ſame time.

nevertheleſs is not conſider'd as an infamy. Some are jugglers, mountebanks and rope-dancers, others are weavers; ſome ſow, others turn ſoldiers: but the moſt abject of all the branches of the fourth caſte, is that of the Pallas's, who are held almoſt in as great contempt as the Perreas, of whom mention will be made in the ſequel. Among the Soudras they alſo reckon the family of the Correvas, a wandring and vagabond ſet of people, who have no other habitations but little portable huts, which they carry on their aſſes when they travel. They ſtand a ſmall time at the gates of cities, to ſell Toupen and Tatous, or ſmall fans, to winnow rice. We cannot better compare them than to thoſe vagabonds, who every now and then ſtrole through the cities in France, with a bundle of mouſe-traps and ſuch trifles. Some of theſe go to the ſea-ſide for ſalt, which they carry up into the country. Their poverty and miſery ſecures them from being tax'd; and as to their wives, they tell fortunes.

The Perreas are the refuſe of the whole nation, nor have they the honour to be conſider'd as a caſte. They are look'd upon as unclean, and are not ſuffer'd to live in the ſame ſtreet with the reſt, but have a ſeparate quarter allotted them in every city. Their villages are always at a diſtance from others; they alſo have their wells apart; and for fear leſt any perſon ſhould, through inadvertency, go and draw water out of them, they are oblig'd to ſcatter bones all around, as a mark to keep every one from coming to them. They dare not walk in the ſtreets, nor go into thoſe villages which the Bramins inhabit, nor enter into the temples of Viſnou and of Eſvara, leſt their uncleanneſs ſhould infect the Bramins and the temple. They dig the ground, follow hedging and ditching, build houſes for the common people, and, in a word, exerciſe all ſuch employments as the reſt think beneath themſelves. Their extreme poverty makes them feed upon all kind of animals, without the leaſt reluctance, not excepting the cow, nor even the fleſh of ſuch beaſts as come in their way, tho' they are dead and ſtinking; which makes them ſtill more odious and contemptible to the Bramins, who are ſurprizingly nice in eating. Who would imagine that ſuch miſerable wretches ſhould ever take it into their heads to prefer themſelves to other people? 'Tis never-theleſs certain, that pride, which is to be found in rags, has alſo infected the minds of the Perreas. Theſe imagine themſelves to be much ſuperior to the Siriperes, another branch of this fifth family, moſt of whom are tanners and leather-dreſſers, and ſome ſoldiers. The Perreas would not condeſcend to eat in the houſe of a Siripere, but the Siriperes make no ſcruple of eating in that of a Perreas. The Siriperes acknowledge their inferiority, and uſe certain marks of reſpect which they are oblig'd to obſerve, ſuch as holding their hands on high, and not daring to ſit down in the preſence of a Perreas. One of theſe, at Paliacatta, in 1640, having fail'd in his duty in this reſpect, the Perreas laid hold of him and cut off his hair, which is the greateſt affront that could poſſibly have been put upon him. Another hardſhip to which the Siriperes are oblig'd to ſubmit, is, that whenever they marry, they are not allow'd to make a Pandal with more than three pillars to it. The Pandal is a kind of arbour or bower, rais'd before the doors of young married women. They ſet up three or four poles, ſeven or eight foot in length, round which the leaves of the Piſan-tree, the ſymbol of joy, are entwin'd: theſe poles ſupport others that are laid croſs-ways, which are cover'd with leaves, in order to form a ſhade. The Siriperes, as was before obſerv'd, are allow'd to ſet up no more than three pillars, and the infringing of this cuſtom would be more than ſufficient to occaſion an inſurrection. When any artificer of the fourth caſte dies, in caſe his relations are willing to go to the expence of having Siriperes at his funeral, the latter are oblig'd to cut off their beards and to follow the body, and for this they are allow'd a ſuit of clothes and a Fanum, or a Fanum and a half, which is a piece of money, worth about three pence half-penny, Dutch money.

This precedency among the four principal tribes, is grounded on a very whimſical reaſon. They are all of them deſcended from Brahma, but then, ſay they, the

Bramins

Bramins came out of his head, the Settreas from his arms, the Veinsjas from his thighs, and the Soudras from his feet.

CHAP. II.

Of the different Sects among the Bramins.

THE Bramins are divided into ſeveral ſects, whence there reſults a difference in manners, and theſe are ſix in number, viz. the Viſtnouvas, the Seivias, the Smaertas, the Schaervaeckas, the Paſendas, and the Tſchectteas.

The Viſtnouvas are ſo called, becauſe they acknowledge no other god than Viſtnou. Some Soudras aſſume the quality of Daetſeri, i. e. ſervants. The Bramins are alſo call'd Daetsja or Daſa, which alſo ſignifies ſervants, but with this difference, that the Bramins are ſervants of God, and the Soudras thoſe of the Bramins; who aſſure them, that they are infinitely more agreeable to Viſtnou upon that account, and alſo that ſuch Soudras as die in defending or preſerving of the Bramins, go after their deaths into Devendre-Locon, a kind of paradiſe, which will afterwards be mention'd.

The Viſtnouvas are of two ſorts: the one are call'd Tadvadi-Viſtnouvas, or Madva-Viſtnouvas. Tadvadi is a word in the Samſcortam language, ſignifying a divine, from Tadva, divinity. Madva is the name of their founder. The other ſort of Viſtnouvas are call'd Ramanouja, from Ramanowa-Atsjaria, author of that ſect. The Tadvadi are diſtinguiſh'd by a white ſtreak, which they themſelves daily make, from the noſe to the forehead, and on the temples, and by a little round mark, which they themſelves make, at the joining of the arm and the ſhoulder-blade, and on the two nipples. They pretend that this is Viſtnou's mark; that it defends them from the devil and Jamna the judge of hell. They promiſe Viſtnou not to ſerve or acknowledge any other god but himſelf; and add, that a virtuous life muſt illuſtrate this promiſe, and that otherwiſe they will be puniſh'd for breaking their vows. The chief of the Tadvadi lives at Combecomne, a place known in Palliaccate. He has generally a bamboo cane in his hand, and is oblig'd either to live ſingle, or relinquiſh all his poſſeſſions when he marries.

The Ramanoujas draw with Namou, a kind of chalk, a figure reſembling the letter Y, which extends from the noſe to the forehead; but they mark themſelves, once for all, with fire, at the joining of the arm and the ſhoulder-blade: this, they ſay, is ſufficient, and diſpenſes them from the neceſſity of marking their bodies daily. They are a kind of Quietiſts, and aſſert, that 'tis ſufficient for a man to give himſelf once to God with a ſincerity of heart, and to have made a vow of being his only; and that if they ſhould happen to lead ill lives after this, Viſtnou would not puniſh them for it; for, ſay they, he never abandons thoſe he has once lov'd. A father does not kill his ſon when he has committed a fault, and 'tis impoſſible for man to live without ſin. Theſe Ramanoujas go bare-headed, and with their hair cut very ſhort, except that they leave a tuft upon the crown, which hangs behind in a knot. Their principal chief reſides at Cansjevaram, a famous city of the kingdom of Carnata. He has the privilege of wearing a piece of linnen-cloth wound round his head whenever he ſpeaks to any perſon. They boaſt their being better men than the Tadvadi, becauſe they never meddle with traffick, nor frequent ill houſes, and puniſh with great rigour all ſuch as are catch'd in them; whereas the Tadvadi may go into them without being cenſur'd for it.

The ſecond ſect of the Bramins is that of the Seivias, who acknowledge Eſvara for the ſovereign God, making him ſuperior to Viſtnou. Such of the Soudras as join themſelves to the Bramins of this ſect, are call'd Tangam. The Seivias are known by three or four ſtreaks which they make upon their heads with cow-dung aſhes. Some wear a Lingam about their necks, which is a ſtone of a certain ſhape; and others wear it in their hair. Their children of eight or ten years old alſo wear it, but then 'tis covered with wax, and is tied about their arms with a ſmall cord. This Lingam is a public teſtimony of their being wholly devoted to Eſwara; and the Soudras who wear it abſtain, like the Bramins, from every thing that has life.

The third ſect is call'd Smaertas, and was founded by Sancra Atsjaria. The Smaertas ſay, that Viſtnou and Eſwara are one and the ſame God, and worſhip'd only under different repreſentations or images; and don't approve of the diſputes which the two preceding ſects have among themſelves about either of theſe names. They are not diſtinguiſh'd from one another by any exterior mark, and have few followers among the common people; for beſides that they couch their doctrine under very myſterious terms, and ſpeak of it in the moſt pompous phraſe; a ſpirit of moderation is not ſo apt to engage the populace, as thoſe particular opinions which are inculcated with an air of enthuſiaſm.

The fourth ſect is that of the Schaerwaeckas, who are a kind of Epicureans, that don't believe in the immortality of the ſoul, and treat every thing they hear mention'd concerning a life to come, as fooliſh and ridiculous: if we except this particular, they may be ſaid to lead very regular and exemplary lives.

The fifth ſect, call'd the Paſendas, look upon every thing which the three firſt maintain as fabulous, and agree with the fourth in their notions of the mortality of the ſoul; but they are far from being as ſtrict in their morals. The Paſendas abandon themſelves to vice without the leaſt reſtraint, and are ſo wretchedly diſſolute, that they have no regard to any degree of conſanguinity in their debaucheries, but ſay, that every woman is their own wife while they are enjoying her. The members of this ſect dare not always own themſelves to be of it, for ſome of them have been tore to pieces, from a hatred of their impious doctrine.

The Tſchectteas are the ſixth ſect. Theſe pretend that Tſchectti is the true God, and that Viſtnou, Eſwara and Brahma are his creatures, and exiſt only thro' him. They refuſe to follow the precepts of the Vedam, and reject every thing that cannot be demonſtrated by the teſtimony of the ſenſes. The three laſt ſects are look'd upon as hereticks, and are too odious to gain over many followers.

CHAP. III.

Of the Vanapraſtas, the San-jaſiis, and the Avadoutas.

THE Bramins have alſo their anchorets, who diſtinguiſh themſelves from the reſt of mankind, by a peculiar way of life, to which they aſcribe a certain degree of perfection. Thoſe of the firſt tribe are call'd Jaguis; thoſe of the caſte of the Soudras are named Joguis. There are three kinds of Jaguis, viz. the Vanapraſtas, the San-jaſiis, and the Avadoutas.

The Vanapraſtas live retir'd in the woods, together with their wives and children, and feed only on ſuch herbs and fruits as they can get without labour. A great many ſcruple to pluck up even the leaſt root, and would imagine they committed a ſin, were they to thus diſlodge the ſoul of a plant from the body in which it reſided. This is look'd upon as a very holy way of life.

The San-jaſiis affect a greater abſtinence, and abſtain from marriage, betel, and all pleaſures in general. They are allow'd to make but one meal, and to live on alms; and inſtead of a copper cup, which others generally carry about them, are permitted to uſe earthen-ware only. Their clothes are dy'd with red earth, and they have a long bamboo-cane in their hands. They are forbid to touch either gold or ſilver, much leſs to carry any about them: they are not permitted to have any fix'd habitation, nor ſuffer'd to lie two nights together in the ſame place, once a year excepted, when they are allow'd to continue two months together in the ſame place. They then make choice of ſuch a ſpot as is thought to be holy, and there they are ſuffer'd to ſpend not only two months, but all their life-time, if they think proper. They are bound to be always ready to oppoſe ſix enemies, viz. 1ſt, Cama, luſt; 2d, Croota, anger; 3d, Lopa, avarice; 4th, Madda, pride; 5th, the love of the things of this world; 6th, Matſara, a thirſt for revenge. Thoſe only of the tribe of the Bramins, who lead this kind of life, are call'd San-jaſiis; for if they are Sattreas or Veinsjas, they are call'd Perma-Ampha; and if Soudras, they are then call'd Joguis. The [a] laſt indulge themſelves in greater liberties than the true San-jaſiis.

The Avadoutas leave their wives and children, and abandon even what the San-jaſiis keep, ſuch as an earthen-porringer, a bamboo-cane, clothes, &c. All they are worth in the world, is no more than a little piece of linnen-cloth, with which they cover the pudenda, and there are ſome of them who don't even take this precaution, but go ſtark naked. They rub their bodies with aſhes, and whenever they are hungry, they go at once into any houſe, when, without ſo much as ſpeaking one word, they only hold out their hands, and immediately eat whatever is given them. Some of theſe will not even give themſelves the trouble to ask for alms in this manner, but lay themſelves down on the bank of ſome river, where the country people, who look upon theſe rivers as holy, never fail to bring them milk and fruits in abundance; ſo that theſe lazy religious are not ſo miſerable as ſome people may imagine.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Vedam, and the Privileges it allows the Bramins.

THE Vedam is the book of the law among theſe people, and contains all they are to believe or practiſe. 'Tis written in the Samſcortan tongue, which is underſtood by ſuch of the Bramins as never traffick. It was divided into four parts, viz. 1ſt, Rogo-Vedam, which treats of the firſt cauſe, of the firſt matter, of the angels, of the ſoul, of rewards and puniſhments, of the generation and corruption of creatures, of ſin, and in what manner it may be remitted, &c. 2d, Iſſoure-Vedam, which treats of the powers that preſide over, and govern all things. 3d, Sama-Vedam, containing a ſyſtem of morality, to prompt men to the practice of virtue, to ſhun vice, and hate the wicked. And 4thly, Addaravana-Vedam, which treated of their religious ceremonies, temples, ſacrifices and feaſts. This laſt part has been loſt for many years, and 'tis to this the Bramins impute the diminution of their honours and the power they formerly enjoy'd. The Vedam is here of indiſputable authority, they are oblig'd to ſubmit to its deciſions whenever it is alledg'd to them; however, as they uſed to diſpute frequently on the manner of interpreting it, the ſenſe of it has been fix'd by the Jaſtra's or declarations.

This book allows the Bramins five privileges. The firſt is, to celebrate the Jagam, which is a feaſt accompanied with a ſacrifice. They ſtrangle their victims, whether it be [a] The Jeſuits, in the Latin relation of their miſſions in the Indies, in 1598 and 99, relate, that they ſaw a Jogui who had quite ſhut himſelf up in an iron cage, except his head and legs, and that he walk'd in this manner without being able to ſit or lie down. On the ſides of this cage were an hundred lamps, which were lighted up at certain times by four Joguis who accompanied him. This fellow thus equip'd, ſtarted along with as much vanity and ſelf-love, as if he had been a ſun that gave light to the univerſe. Nova Hiſtorica Relatio de rebus in India Orientali à P. P. Societatis J. geſtis. Moguntiæ 1601.

be that they are forbid to ſhed the blood of any animal, or, in order to have it more entire. They afterwards cut it up, then burn it, at the ſame time repeating certain prayers adapted to the ſolemnity; but reſerve the heart, which they divide among thoſe Bramins that aſſiſt at the feaſt, who are not allow'd to eat fleſh on any other occaſion. A great many Bramins ſhun this ſolemnity, purely from the horror with which they are ſeiz'd at the thoughts of eating the victim.

The celebration of the Jagam is very expenſive, for the perſon at whoſe expence it is made, is oblig'd to maintain all the Bramins who aſſiſt at it, tho' they ſhould amount to a thouſand, and they ſometimes continue at his houſe ten, twenty, and even thirty days. He was formerly oblig'd to give them whatever they ſhould take it into their heads to ask of him, but now he is quit for treating them. They perform this ſacrifice purely that they may deſerve to go to Devendre-Locon, which is the manſion of the bleſſed, where Devendre will preſide over them. Such of the Bramins as hope to go into heaven itſelf, take care never to celebrate the Jagam.

The ſecond privilege of the Bramins, is their being allow'd to inſtruct the Sattreas in the manner of celebrating this feaſt; from which the Veinsjas are excluded, and much more the Soudras.

The third privilege is the permiſſion of reading the Vedam.

The fourth is a liberty of teaching it to other Bramins and the Settreas, who, becauſe they have learnt it of the Bramins, are therefore allow'd to read it, but not to teach it to others. The Veinsjas dare not read it, nor repeat any part of it, nor even hear any of it repeated; but there is not the ſame prohibition with regard to the Jaſtra. As for the Soudras, they are not allow'd ſo much as to ſpeak of the Vedam, or even to learn the Jaſtra.

The fifth privilege is the being allow'd the liberty to beg: the other tribes are ſuffer'd to give alms, but they are not permitted to receive any; and indeed there is nothing the Bramins recommend ſo much in their writings, as alms-giving and charity, provided it be exercis'd towards themſelves; but they never fail to hint, that they are no ways meritorious when beſtow'd on any other perſons. As for themſelves, they only extend their charity to ſome few Bramins; and all they would anſwer a Soudra, who ſhould tell them of their great neceſſity, would be po, po, i. e. go on, go on. They get the moſt alms from the devotees on thoſe ſolemn days which are call'd Samcramanam, and at the burials of thoſe who leave ſomething behind them. Some of them are ſo infatuated with the merit of this charity, that the alms they beſtow on the Bramins and Joguis, brings them to utter ruin; and indeed their doors are continually crouded with them.

CHAP. V.

The Employments and Maintenance of the Bramins.

THE Bramins are the inſtructors of the people, whom they are oblig'd to educate in reading, writing, and accompts, and to inſtruct their diſciples in all things relating to religion. If they have enough to live upon, they are not allow'd to take any recompence; but if poor, they have the liberty of receiving from their diſciples whatever may be neceſſary for their ſubſiſting in a decent manner. Their kings are oblig'd to provide for them, to enable them to teach gratis, but the number of Bramins is ſo great, that 'tis impoſſible to provide for them all. We are aſſur'd that they poſſeſs a third part of the revenues of the country, notwithſtanding which, great numbers of them are reduc'd to the neceſſity of begging; others traffick, or practiſe phyſick. They are forbid to follow any mechanic trades, under which, husbandry, painting, &c. are rank'd.

rank'd. They cannot do certain offices without derogating from their quality, ſuch as waſhing the feet, folding betel, &c. for any perſon whatever, not tho' it were for the king himſelf. And a Bramin who ſhould demean himſelf in this manner, would be degraded and drove from the reſt: but they may be ſecretaries, ambaſſadors, and counſellors, and theſe employments are generally exercis'd by them only.

To ſuch Bramins as the king maintains he gives villages, but not in quality of their paſtors or teachers, as our rectors, but as proprietors and poſſeſſors. It has ſometimes happen'd, as under the reign of Rama Raja, whoſe memory is ſtill curs'd upon that account, that the kings have claim'd thoſe poſſeſſions, or commanded the Bramins to give them the half of the revenue of thoſe villages; but other kings, either mov'd with compaſſion, or tir'd out with their complaints, have diſpens'd with this diviſion of their revenues. But the Bramins fearing leſt they ſhould be diſpoſſeſſed of the villages one time or other, to aſſiſt the exigencies of the ſtate, upon pretence that they have enjoy'd them long enough, ask leave to allow certain perſons who are extremely poor, a ſhare in their villages; which they have no ſooner obtain'd, but they make a private engagement with ſome of their relations. This permiſſion is engraved on copper, and all ſuch villages as are divided in this manner, are not liable to be demanded back again; for the kings who ſucceed the donor, would be afraid that the complaints of the poor would make them obnoxious to Viſtnou or Eſwara.

CHAP. VI.

Ceremonies uſed by the Bramins after the Birth of their Children.

THIS birth, and not the embracing their doctrines, that conſtitutes the Bramins. They ſay that the imitation of their life leads to heaven, but that it cannot make him a Bramin who was not born ſuch. The Bramins conſider their children as unclean till the tenth day after their birth, during which no perſon is allow'd to touch them, except ſuch as tend them. The houſe they are born in is unclean, and no one can enter it without being polluted. The tenth day, the houſe and the child-bed linnen, which the mother uſed, are purified: they throw out all the earthen ware that is to be found in the houſe, and clean all the copper veſſels. The twelfth day they light the fire Homam, which is look'd upon as very holy, and repeat certain prayers: the fire being out, they give the child ſome of the names following; Nainopa, Naraina, Beireva, Damerſa, Padmanaba, Ragoa, Tirrenata, Marlepa, Devela, Tamopa, Carpa, Vellopa, Rama, Sancra, Goyenda, Varreda, Veinketi. After the child is named they bore his ears, to ſignify the [a] ſervitude he vows to Viſtnou or Eſwara. This ceremony is ſometimes ſuſpended till ſuch time as they give the child the Dſandhem, but never longer.

The child is not look'd upon as a Bramin till he has receiv'd this Dſandhem, which is a kind of little ſhoulder-belt, made of three ſtrings, each of which has nine threads of cotton, which the Bramins only are allow'd to make. He is carry'd in a ſling, which comes over the left ſhoulder, and hangs under the right arm. Children may receive it at five years of age, but they ſometimes ſtay till they are ten; but the poverty of the parents generally occaſions this delay, this ceremony putting them to ſome expence. They are oblig'd to light the fire Homam, and burn Ravaſitou-wood in it, which they look upon as the holieſt of all trees; this fire is plac'd on a little eminence, over which they raiſe raiſe a kind of canopy with their clothes ſpread; underneath are the Bramins, who throw into the fire Nili or rice, with its chaff; butter, Zingeli, a ſeed with which they make oil for burning; wheat, boil'd rice, and incenſe, during which they repeat certain prayers. All the Bramins who are invited to this ceremony, which laſts four days, have their expences bore by the child's parents.

The young Bramins who have receiv'd the Dſandhem, go by the name of Bramaſariis till they are married. The Vedam prohibits their having any commerce with women, or to eat betel, which is a provocative to love, during the time they continue ſingle: they are allow'd to make but one meal a-day, which they are to procure by begging; however they mind theſe precepts very little, that excepted which relates to betel.

When a perſon has once receiv'd the Dſandhem, he is oblig'd to wear it all his life-time; and if it ſhould happen to break through wearing, he is not to eat till he has got himſelf another, and till then the reſt are not obliged to look upon him as a Bramin. But to prevent theſe accidents, they always have a new one every year at the feaſt of Traſvanala-Poudeva, that happens in Auguſt, which is the ſeaſon of their giving the Dſandhem to children. The other families may alſo wear it out of devotion, but then they are oblig'd to purchaſe it of the Bramins.

Theſe Bramaſariis learn to read, to write, to caſt accompts, &c. of thoſe Bramins who are appointed to teach. Every family make it a point of honour not to ſend their children to ſchool to ſuch maſters as are of an inferior caſte; but the Settreas, for inſtance, ſend their children to the Bramins, or to the maſters of the ſame caſte with themſelves. None of the three firſt will condeſcend to teach the children of the Perreas, and the Soudras only will admit them into their ſchools.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Philoſophy of the Bramins.

WE don't find among the modern Bramins any footſteps of the philoſophy for which their anceſtors were ſo famous; and as for [a] aſtrology, they are ſo groſſly ignorant of this ſcience, that their ableſt men ſcarce know how to calculate an eclipſe of the ſun or moon, and the conjunction of the planets, not to mention that they are ignorant of the cauſes of it. That which they give for the eclipſes of the ſun and moon, is as follows:

Viſtnou and Eſwara held one day a council with the [b] Devetas and Ratsjasjas, that is, with the angels and devils, in order to find out ſomething, the poſſeſſion whereof might be a preſervative againſt hunger, thirſt, wearineſs, and even death itſelf. The reſult was, that they ſhould throw into the ſea the mountain Merouva, which is of pure gold, whoſe top touches the empyreal heaven which ſtands over the eight worlds, and whoſe foot reaches down to the bottom of the abyſs; that they ſhould whirl that mountain about as a turner turns his work, and ſhould make uſe of the great ſerpent Sesja inſtead of a rope. The Devetas and Ratsjasjas being employ'd in turning this mountain about, ſeveral prodigies appear'd, and among the reſt a poiſon call'd Kalekote-Visjam, of ſo venomous and dreadful a nature, that the whole world was alarm'd at it, and implor'd the ſuccour of Viſtnou. Eſwara, in order to rid them of this poiſon, put it into his mouth, but it ſtuck in his throat, whence he is ſurnam'd Nile-Canta, or

[a] Aſtronomy, I ſuppoſe.
[b] Bernier calls it Deutas; perhaps he had written Devtas, by pronouncing it almoſt as if it had been written Deſtas, which wou'd be the ſame thing.

or black-throat. After this there appear'd a woman exquiſitely beautiful; her Viſtnou married, and 'tis ſhe is at this time his wife Latſemi, whoſe temple is within that of Viſtnou. After this, what they were in ſearch of appear'd, viz. Amortam, being a liquor like milk, for which reaſon the Bramins, tho' they dare not drink water in a houſe, may yet drink milk, from its reſemblance to Amortam.

No ſooner was the Amortam found, but Viſtnou put an end to the fatigue of the Devetas and the Ratsjasjas, and to eaſe their wearineſs, order'd them to draw up in two lines, that he might give them ſome of that liquor to drink, which they had procur'd by their labour. He made the Devetas taſte of it, but not being willing to indulge immortality to the Ratsjasjas, he gave them a different liquor. Two of the latter, whoſe names were Ragou and Ketou, ſuſpecting their companions would not have the ſame liquor as the Devetas, chang'd place and put themſelves among the latter. Accordingly they drank Amortam with the reſt; but the ſun and moon perceiv'd the fraud, and gave Viſtnou notice thereof, who immediately cut off their heads, which were immortal, becauſe of the Amortam's continuing in them; it not being yet got down into their bodies, which were ſhap'd like thoſe of ſerpents. Theſe two heads began to proteſt againſt the injuſtice of Viſtnou, ſaying; Why do you treat us in this manner for having drank Amortam? did not we labour as much as the reſt? Viſtnou anſwer'd, that from that time forward they ſhould remain without bodies, but that their heads alone ſhould enjoy as much pleaſure as if their bodies had been join'd to them. Ragou and Ketou have entertain'd a mortal hatred againſt the ſun and moon for making this diſcovery: they fight againſt them from time to time; and the darkneſs which happens during eclipſes, is owing to Ragou and Ketou's having ſwallow'd one, or both, of their enemies.

CHAP. VIII.

The Marriages of the Bramins.

SUCH Bramins as have ſons, endeavour to marry them betimes; the rich are more haſty in this matter than the poor, but thoſe of the three firſt caſtes never marry them till ſuch time as they have receiv'd the Dſandhem. Thoſe of the firſt are oblig'd to make choice of ſuch young women as have not yet the marks of puberty. The parents of thoſe young women who have them before they get husbands, conceal that circumſtance very carefully, for fear it ſhould prevent their ever being married. But the parents of ſuch young men as are afraid of this, provide for their ſons, girls who are ſtill younger, to prevent their being impos'd upon. The Settreas don't obſerve this cuſtom ſo exactly as the Bramins, however all thoſe who conform themſelves to it, have the greateſt reſpect ſhewn them.

When a Bramin goes to demand a young woman in marriage for his ſon, he pays the higheſt regard to preſages. If he meets a ſiniſter ſign in his way, he then poſtpones the affair to ſome other day; in caſe he has a bad ſign a ſecond time, he again puts it off; but if the ſame happens a third time, he then lays aſide all thoughts of the match, from a firm perſuaſion that it would be unhappy. To hear a ſerpent nam'd the firſt day a Bramin is going upon ſuch an affair, is a bad ſign; but the ſeeing one is enough to make him lay it wholly aſide. The Veinsjas have a particular cuſtom among them, and that is the melting down a half-pagod or half-ducat of gold: in caſe the gold, after 'tis thus melted down, appears with a ſhining hue, 'tis then a propitious ſign; but in caſe it be dull, they change their reſolutions; however, the Bramins laugh at this kind of divination.

The man whoſe daughter is ſought for in marriage, deſires to ſee the youth who is to be his future ſon-in-law, when he enquires into his ſubſtance. In caſe he finds matters to his ſatisfaction, he then allows him to viſit her in preſence of her parents; and then if the young couple are pleaſed with each other, and the parents give their conſent, they are immediately married. The conſent of the Soudras muſt be purchas'd, and they oblige the lover, before they allow him to marry their daughter, to give them a certain ſum of money over and [a] above the bargain; and this they call a gift, for they would be aſham'd to have it thought they ſold their daughters.

When the parties are agreed, they make choice of a fortunate day; for theſe people have a calendar, in which the lucky and unlucky days are ſet down. Then the relations on both ſides meet, and perform a ceremony which anſwers to our betrothings. The bride's father preſents betel to the bridegroom's relations, and declares to the company, that he has given his daughter to — N—, a member of the family of the perſons preſent. This being done, the bridegroom's relations give betel to thoſe of the bride, when they make the ſame declaration, and take the company for witneſſes; and when this is perform'd, the couple are married, provided it be at a proper time, for they are not allow'd to marry in all ſeaſons of the year. There are certain months appointed for that purpoſe, and theſe are February, May, June, October, and the beginning of November; as alſo certain ſtated hours in thoſe months, all which they obſerve very carefully.

When the time for conſummating the marriage is come, they light the fire Homam with the wood of Ravaſitou. [b] The Bramin bleſſes the former, which being done, the bridegroom takes three handfuls of rice and throws it on the bride's head, who does the ſame to him. Afterwards the bride's father clothes her in a dreſs according to his condition, and waſhes the bridegroom's feet, the bride's mother obſerving to pour out the water. This being done, the father puts his daughter's hand in his own, puts water into it, ſome pieces of money, and giving it to the bridegroom, ſays at the ſame time; I have no longer any thing to do with you, and I give you up to the power of another. The Tali, which is a ribbon with a golden head hanging at it, is held ready, and being ſhewn to the company, ſome prayers and bleſſings are pronounced, after which the bridegroom takes it and hangs it about the bride's neck. This knot is what particularly ſecures his poſſeſſion of her, for before he had tied the Tali on, all the reſt of the ceremonies might have been made to no purpoſe; for it has ſometimes happen'd, that when the bridegroom was going to fix it on, the bride's father has diſcover'd his not being ſatisfy'd with the bridegroom's gift, when another offering more, has carried off the bride with her father's conſent. But when once the Tali is put on, the marriage is indiſſoluble; and whenever the husband dies, the Tali is burnt along with him, to ſhew that the marriage bands are broke. Beſides theſe particular ceremonies, the people have notice of the wedding by a [c] Pandal, which is rais'd before the bride's door ſome days before. The whole concludes with an entertainment which the bride's father gives to the common friends; and during this feſtivity, which continues five days, alms are given to the poor, and the fire Homam is kept in. The ſeventh day, the new-married couple ſet out for the bridegroom's houſe, whither they frequently go by torch-light. The bride and bridegroom are carried in a ſedan; paſs through the chief ſtreets of the city, and are accompanied by their friends, who are either on horſeback or mounted on elephants. In caſe the bride is not of an age fit for conſummating the marriage, her relations don't leave her above three or

[a] In the French 'tis en forme de pot de vin, which anſwers to the term uſed by the common people in buying certain things, when they ask for a bleſſing, which is ſomething over and above.

[b] Theſe people pretend, that the Bramins among men, the Cow among quadrupeds, the Garouda among birds, the Ganges among rivers, and the Kavaſitou among trees, are particularly pleaſing to God, and aſcribe a particular holineſs to them all.

[c] I have already deſcrib'd the Pandal.

or four days in her husband's houſe, after which ſhe is brought back to that of her father; but if ſhe is arriv'd at puberty, ſhe ſtays with her husband.

The Bramaſariis no longer go by that name when they are married, but are call'd Grahaſtas, and on that occaſion they add three ſtrings more to the Dſandhem. They are oblig'd to increaſe it in the ſame manner every ten years, and at the birth of every child. But tho' the Vedam is expreſs on this head, they yet don't ſcruple very often to neglect its injunctions. The Bramins, who are forbid to go with their ſtomachs bare, think it ſufficiently covered when they have got theſe ſtrings on.

The above-mentioned think it derogatory to their character to marry women of another caſte; not but ſome of them, when they are not pleaſed with their parents choice, marry women of an inferior caſte, when they happen to fall in love with them; but their marrying a woman of the caſte of the Soudras, is thought to be ſo criminal an action, that if a Bramin happens to have any children by ſuch an one, he is excluded heaven as long as that unworthy race continues upon earth. Their Poranes, or chronicles relate, that the Bramin Sandragoupeti Naraia was ſeiz'd with the deepeſt affliction when his ſon Barthroukerri, whom he had had by a wife of the caſte of the Soudras, had married three hundred wives; concluding that the prodigious number of their deſcendants, would fruſtrate him of the enjoyment of the felicities of the life to come for a long ſeries of years.

Inceſt is one of the five ſins, the remiſſion whereof is not eaſily obtain'd. The man is by the Vedam condemn'd to loſe the guilty parts, and as they will not ſuffer the wound to be dreſs'd, the operation is always mortal; but the woman is not puniſh'd, it being always ſuppos'd the man had ſeduc'd her.

The degrees of conſanguinity among them are pretty near the ſame as with us, except that they allow the marrying of two ſiſters. They make a diſtinction between couſin-germains and nieces; a man may marry the daughter of his aunt by the father's ſide, or their ſiſter's daughter; but the marriage would be inceſtuous, were they to marry either their uncle's daughter by the father's ſide, or their brother's daughter. The Soudras, who are leſs ſcrupulous on this head, marry indifferently their brother's or ſiſter's daughter.

As polygamy is not prohibited by the Vedam, the four caſtes are left to their liberty on that article, and the Poranes mention ſeveral Bramins whoſe reputation was not injur'd by a plurality of wives.

When a Bramin finds that his wife has violated the faith ſhe owed him, he may confine her at home, but muſt take care not to let the world know any thing of it. Some among them chuſe rather to diſſemble ſuch an affair, by guarding againſt it for the future, particularly if they love their wives, and are abſolutely bent upon enjoying them. However, if once the crime is divulg'd, the other Bramins look upon the houſe as polluted, refuſe to eat, or even enter into it; in which caſe the husband prepares a feaſt, and invites the Bramins and Sansjaſiis to partake of it. The adultereſs waits upon the gueſts on this occaſion, and when once the Bramins have condeſcended to take any victuals from her hands, the reſt of the company don't ſcruple to follow their example; and when this is done, the husband may keep his wife as before, without reflecting the leaſt diſhonour on himſelf.

CHAP. IX.

Of the lucky or unluckyDays, and of the Panjamgam.

THE Bramins are ſuperſtitiouſly of opinion, that there are certain days on which it would be impoſſible for them to ſucceed in any affair whatever. But this fatal prejudice often makes them neglect the moſt favourable opportunities, when they happen to to fall out on ſuch a day as is mark'd an unlucky one in the Panjangam, i. e. in an almanack, in which both the lucky and unlucky days are ſet down.

This Panjaugam, which they look upon as infallible, is of two kinds. [a] The one was made by Brahaſpeti, doctor of the Devetas or good angels, wherein he has ſet down the lucky and unlucky days, and even ſuch as are but half lucky, or ſo during a few hours only. A new one is annually made on this model, which ſerves for a guide to the country people. The other Panjangam, they ſay, was compos'd by Succra, doctor of the Ratsjajas or devils. This is ſo very particular, as to take notice of every hour in the natural day, which this people divide into 60 hours.

'Tis plain that they muſt often let opportunities ſlip, if, to the great number of days and hours during which they are diverted from attempting any affair, we ſhould add their great credulity with regard to ſigns or preſages. 'Tis a good ſign when they ſee the bird [b] Garrouda, or that call'd Pala, flying before them, and croſs-ways, from right to leſt. Other birds are, on the contrary, of good augury, if they fly from leſt to right. If a magpye, of which there are great numbers in that country, happens to touch any perſon in its flight, they immediately conclude that ſuch perſon, or one of his relations, will die in ſix weeks. If any one happens to ſneeze while a perſon is going out of the houſe, he turns back again immediately.

The Bramins begin the year with the new moon of April, by a feaſt which they call [c] Samvat-Iſaradi Panduga. The year is divided into twelve months, viz. Tſeitram, April; Veinjacam, May; Jeiſtam, June; Ajadam, July; Sravanam, Auguſt; Badrapadam, September; Asvaijam, October; Carticam, November; Margiſaram, December; Poujam, January; Magam, February; Palgouvam, March. But as theſe months, which are lunar ones, would not agree exactly with the ſolar year, they intercalate or add a thirteenth month every three years, in the ſame manner as we [d] add a day to February every leap-year.

The ſeven days of the week are call'd, in the Samſcortam language, by names that anſwer to the ſeven planets, and are as follows; Suria-Varam, Sunday; Jendra-Varam, Monday; Angaraca-Varam, Tueſday; Butta-Varam, Wedneſday; Brahaſpeti-Varam, Thurſday; Succra-Varam, Friday; Senni-Varam, Saturday. Sura ſignifies the ſun, and Jendra the month, or the moon. Sunday is alſo call'd Adita-Varam, and Monday Somo-Varam.

As the antient Greeks computed by olympiads, each of which conſiſted of [e] four years, and the Roman chancery had its indictions, each of which were fifteen years; ſo the Bramins have a revolution of threeſcore years, at the end of which they begin another. They don't diſtinguiſh each of theſe years numerally, that is, they don't ſay the 30*th* or 40*th* year, but each year has its particular name. Here follows theſe names in the order in which they are placed; but for brevity ſake, it may be proper to acquaint the reader, that the word Samſvatſaram, ſignifying the year, is added to each. 1 Prabava, 2 Bipava, 3 Suckela, 4 Pramadonta, 5 Prajopatti, 6 Augireſa, 7 Tſrimocha, 8 Bhava, 9 Jouva, 10 Dhatou, 11 Eſvara, 12 Bahoudhau-ja, 13 Pramadi, 14 Vierama, 15 Visjou, 16 Tſidtrabhanou, 17 Tſabhanou, 18 Tarana, 19 Paartouva, 20 Veiha, 21 Thervaſittou, 22 Tſervadari, 23 Vierothi, 24 Vicrouti, 25 Carram, 26 Nandana, 27 Viſei-ja, 28 Tſeja, 29 Maumaltha, 30 Dormeki, 31 Hevelembi, 32 Villembi, 33 Vicari, 34 Tſareverri, 35 Plauva, 36 Tſhopo-Cortou, 37 Tſoba-Cortou, 38 Credi, 39 Viſvavaſou, 40 Parabava, 41 Palavanga, 42 Kileka, 43 Tſaumea, 44 Tſadarena, 45 Virodi-Cretou, 46 Pradavi, 47 Paramadiſia, 48 Ananda, 49 Ratjaja, 50

However, this way of computing years is not univerſal, they having a method of fixing the date, when any conſiderable event is to be tranſmitted to diſtant poſterity. As the chriſtians have their Æra, and the Mahometans their Hegira, ſo the Bramins make the reign of Salavagena, of whom the moſt aſtoniſhing things are related, their Epocha. They pretend that he is the ſame with Brahma, who coming to live again upon the earth, aſſum'd that name. Salavagena, according to the calculation made by the Rev. Mr. Royer, on the informations of a Bramin, died anno 2563 of our vulgar Æra, near the end of the reign of Vicramaarca, of whom miracles, no leſs ſurprizing, are related. Here follows ſome of his adventures.

The Bramin, Sandragoupeti abovemention'd, married four wives of four different caſtes; the of the Bramin tribe was deliver'd of Veneroutsfi; the ſecond, who was of the tribe of the Settreas, brought Vicramaarca into the world; the third, being of the tribe of the Veinjas, was the mother of Betti; and the fourth, who was of the tribe of the Soudras, was deliver'd of Barthrouherri. Vicramaarca was a monarch equally dreaded and belov'd by his ſubjects; but, reflecting one day on the ſhortneſs of man's life, he grew ſad, and fancying he ſhould not long enjoy the uninterrupted proſperity with which he was crown'd, fell into a deep melancholy, and conſulted his brother Betti, to whom he always applied in any affairs of importance. Here follows the reſult of their conſultation. There is in the middle of the world a tree, call'd [a] Oudetaba, which ſhoots up out of the earth at ſun-riſe, and growing in proportion as that planet mounts higher, touches it with its top when it comes to the meridian; after which it ſinks downward with the day, and hides itſelf in the earth when the ſun is under the horizon. Set your ſelf on that tree at day-break, ſays Betti to Vicramaarca, and this as it riſes, will carry you up to the ſun, to whom you muſt demand a longer term of years than is indulg'd to the reſt of men.

The king follow'd his advice, but being mounted to a certain height, felt himſelf ſcorch'd with intolerable heat; this however did not damp his courage, and the ſun, who was not diſpleaſed with his deſign, ſoftned the violence of his rays, cool'd him, and promiſed to grant him his requeſt. Thou, ſays he to him, ſhalt ſit a thouſand years upon thy throne, during which neither thy health or ſtrength ſhall be impair'd by any kind of diſeaſe. No ſooner was the tree ſunk down level with the earth, but the king went and told his brother of the ſucceſs of his petition. The ſun has granted you a thouſand years, ſays the faithful Betti, and I myſelf will procure you a thouſand more. Since a promiſe has been made you, that you ſhall ſit a thouſand years on the throne, whenever you ſhall have ſat ſix months thereon, ſpend the remaining half year in travelling, by which means you will double the time which has been allotted you. Vicramaarca alſo follow'd this advice, and met with a very ſingular adventure in his travels. The ſervants of Jegiſoara diſputed about dividing an inheritance which that holy man had bequeath'd to them. This inheritance conſiſted in a purſe, which whoever poſſeſs'd ſhould never want money; in a diſh that would be ever fill'd with meat; in a ſtick ſhap'd like a crook, which whoever was maſter of, need never to ſtand in fear of an enemy; and laſtly, in [b] a ſhoe, whoſe virtue was ſuch, as to convey in an inſtant to whatever place the wearer ſhould deſire to go. Vicramaarca met them as they were ſquabbling, each reſolving to make choice of which of them he thought proper; when making himſelf the umpire, he put on the ſhoe, took the purſe, the diſh and the crook, and vaniſh'd in a moment, leaving the wranglers in the utmoſt confuſion, and vex'd at the heart for having diſagreed in the manner they had done. The writers of of the hiſtories of the Bramins mention a great number of miracles of the ſame ſtamp, wrought by the two brothers in their travels.

The number ſixty is not only uſed for the enumerating of years, for the Bramins, inſtead of dividing the natural day into twenty-four hours, as is the cuſtom among us, divide it into ſixty hours, viz. the day into thirty, and the night into as many. They have a kind of Clepſydra or hour-glaſs, which meaſures time by the running of water, this Clepſydra is only a copper bowl with a hole bored in it; this they leave floating on the water, and when it is full, they empty it, and ſtrike the hour of the day or night on the copper veſſel.

CHAP. X.

The daily Exerciſes of the Bramins.

THE Bramins are oblig'd to obſerve certain ceremonies which it is impoſſible for them to diſpenſe with, without violating the law. I ſhall relate what is enjoin'd them. In regard to all obligatory duties, 'tis eaſier to ſay what ought to be done, than what is really perform'd.

The Bramins are oblig'd to wake two hours, or one at leaſt, before the dawn; and begin by repeating the ſeveral names of God. In caſe they have no buſineſs that obliges them to riſe ſo ſoon, they then may lie half an hour longer in bed, and repeat the name of God to themſelves; however, 'tis better to riſe at once. Having eaſed nature, they waſh their hands, their face and feet; and ſet themſelves down either on a board or a carpet, but never on the bare earth, nor on their beds, with their faces turn'd towards north or eaſt, but never to the ſouth or weſt. The reaſon why they turn towards the eaſt, is becauſe the ſun riſes in that quarter of the heavens; and towards the north, becauſe thoſe places which they look upon as moſt holy, are on that ſide, with reſpect to them. They afterwards begin to ſing the ſtory of Gasjendre Mootsjam; but in caſe the ſun is not yet riſen, they ſing ſome hymn: this being done, they riſe, waſh their mouths and their teeth; or, if there be any ſacred river near their houſes, or ſome Tan, i.e. pool of water, they then go and waſh themſelves in it: but in caſe there be none, they bathe at home, and put on clean clothes.

The Bramins call ſuch clothes clean as have not been put on ſince their being waſh'd, or have been wetted ſince they were worn; they are look'd upon as clean ſo long as they are not worn or touch'd by any perſon. But as ſilks are ſpoil'd by wetting, they have found out a remedy in this caſe, by declaring that ſilk clothes are naturally pure. However, if any one were to eat with a ſilk gown on, it would immediately become unclean, and for this reaſon they throw it off before they ſet down at table.

Being dreſs'd, they ſit down again in the ſame place; take ſome well-water juſt drawn, for if it were a day old 'twould be too ſtale: in this they dip that thing with which they mark their faces; pour water into their hands thrice, and throw it as many times into their mouths, obſerving not to touch it with their hands. This being done, they repeat the twenty-four names of God, which they call making Japon, by touching ſo many parts of the body.

At ſun-riſe they pour water thrice into the hollow of their hands, and throw it on the ground, repeating a ſhort prayer at the ſame time. This ceremony, which is perform'd for the ſun's ſake, is grounded on a chimæra of theirs, viz. that the ſun riſes between certain mountains, and is oblig'd to paſs thro' a narrow paſſage, which is infeſted by certain Genii or ſpirits, who endeavour to check his progreſs. Some Bramins one day threw up water to the ſun, which made ſuch a noiſe as frighted away thoſe devils, devils, and put them to flight. We are very ſenſible, ſay the modern Bramins, that what we now do is of no manner of advantage to the ſun; however we thereby give him a teſtimony of the good-will we bear him, in imitation of thoſe who really ſuccour'd him.

They afterwards begin again to throw water thrice into their mouths, as they pay their adorations to the ſun, and to the Beings who preſide over the worlds ſituated under the heavens. If they are of the ſect of the Viſtnouvas, they take a kind of chaplet, the beads whereof are made of a very fragrant wood call'd Toleje; but the beads of thoſe of the caſte of the Seivias are made of coral or cryſtal. Some put this chaplet about their necks, others hold it in their hands, but hid under their coats, or in a pocket made for that purpoſe. At the end of every prayer they let drop a bead. Thoſe who have not much time to ſpare, ſay only twenty-eight prayers; ſuch as have more leiſure, repeat 128; but ſuch devotees as have nothing to do, ſay over a thouſand.

Theſe prayers being ended, they worſhip Salagrammas, and waſh it with clean water; this is an idol made of a particular ſtone, having a hole in it, in which they ſay are the coats of arms of God. Tiertum is the name of the water wherein they waſh it, which is kept for another religious uſe, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. The idol Salagramma being thus waſh'd, is dreſs'd in a clean ſuit, or wrap'd up in linnen, and anointed with a perfume compoſed of ſandal, odoriferous flowers, and leaves of Toleja. The ſame ceremony is perform'd before another little idol of copper, on each ſide of which they light up one or more wax tapers, according to their ſubſtance or devotion. They preſent it victuals juſt dreſs'd, or elſe fruits or milk. They ſcatter flowers over it, turn thrice and ſometimes more round it, and at every turn they fall proſtrate on the ground with their hands claſp'd, and their arms ſtretch'd out. They afterwards ſet the idol on the ground, take the Tiertum or water with which they had waſh'd Salagramma, throw it once on their heads and thrice in their mouths, with a few leaves of Toleja, and anoint their foreheads with ſome Angaram, which is a preparation of the gum call'd Benjamin. They tell us that this Angaram has the virtue of fortifying the mind a-gainſt ſin, but then it muſt have been offer'd to the idol, as alſo the Toleja, which they put into their ears to prevent the impurity they might otherwiſe contract by touching a dead carcaſs or a Soudra. The virtue of the Tiertum is ſuch, as to purify them from all the ſins they may have committed from their infancy. After having preſented the whole company with Tiertum, they burn a little incenſe, and then have the liberty to go and breakfaſt with thoſe Bramins who aſſiſted at the ceremony. They pray before and after meals, waſh their hands, throw water thrice into their mouths, and make Japon; take Tiertum again, and after this are altogether as pure as before. They repeat this ceremony as often as they imagine they have been polluted.

If they don't breakfaſt, nor eat before noon, the ablution at day-break is not ſufficient; they therefore repeat it, and return to their idol, before which they ſtrew flowers, or, for want of theſe, ſome Toleja, and preſent it with whatever they are to eat; for the Bramins dare not take any ſuſtenance before it has been offer'd to it.

A little before ſun-ſet, they waſh afreſh, mark themſelves, perform Japon, and give water to the ſun. If they are Grahaſtas, i. e. married, they ſup. I have already obſerv'd that the Bramaſariis and the Sansjaſiis make but one meal a-day. Laſtly, they ſay a prayer, and after that go to reſt.

In the morning, at noon, and in the evening, they, after having perform'd the ceremony of the twenty-four names of God, read the Poranes, or antient chronicles; and this book is had in ſuch great veneration among theſe people, that they carefully obſerve to waſh their ears, in order that being pure, they thereby may be more worthy to hear ſo holy a work read.

Nevertheleſs this exerciſe is not ſo punctually obſerv'd, but that a great many Bramins diſpenſe with ſeveral circumſtances in it. However, they are indiſputably oblig'd to perform perform the Tiertum and the Japon; and if one ſingle perſon in a houſe performs every thing enjoin'd in this chapter, that alone ſuffices for the whole family. Indeed very few execute punctually all the things preſcrib'd by the law, except thoſe who are employ'd in the publick worſhip of the idols.

CHAP. XI.

The Story of Gasjendre Motsjam, which is ſung by the Bramins at day-break.

THE Bramins ſing every morning at day-break a hymn, containing the ſtory of [a] Gasjendre Motsjam, the ſubſtance whereof is as follows. In one of the ſeven ſeas of milk is a mountain call'd Tricoveta-Parvatam, ten thouſand leagues high, and as many broad. This mountain has three ſummits, one of which is of gold, the other of ſilver, and the third of iron, each of which is adorn'd with precious ſtones. A Deveta, call'd Indre Doumena, who rides up and down heaven and earth in a chariot, which flies ſwifter than the wind, ſtopping at this mountain, found a place in it which he thought very proper for himſelf and his wife to divert themſelves, and after having waſhed himſelf therein, he ſaw a Moneſvara paſs by, but did not pay him the leaſt honour. Theſe Moneſvaras are, however, of a nature more holy and more exalted than that of the Devetas, for the latter will not be admitted into paradiſe, but after the finiſhing of their courſe muſt return back into the world. The Moneſvara was ſo much the more offended at the incivility of the Deveta, as he knew that his pride, not his ignorance, had made him guilty of it. Thou, ſays he to him by way of curſe, ſhalt become an elephant, and inſtead of women ſhalt have no other company than that of female elephants: for theſe people call the proud elephants, in the ſame manner as we give the name of aſſes to the ſtupid and ignorant.

The Deveta terrified at his doom, would fain have made amends for the fault he had committed, and for that purpoſe humbled himſelf and ſued for pardon; but all he could obtain, was, that he might reſume his firſt ſhape after a certain term of years. But the decree was irrevocable, ſo that he was chang'd into an elephant on the ſame mountain, and had ten [b] Lac-Cotis of females, with whom he liv'd for a long ſeries of years, without dreading either tygers, lions, or other wild-beaſts. As he was one day going to drink at a pond, a crocodile ſeiz'd his foot, and tho' he made a great ſtruggle, would not let go his hold till he tore it off. Returning to drink at the pond, the crocodile laid hold of him a ſecond time, but was not able to tear off his foot. Upon this a combat enſued which laſted for a thouſand years. The match was not equal, for the ſtrength of the elephant diminiſh'd daily, whereas that of the crocodile increas'd, becauſe it was in its own element. At laſt the elephant was defeated, which put an end to his metamorphoſis; and being reſtor'd to his former ſhape, the firſt uſe he made of his reaſon was to think upon God, to pray to him, and compoſe ſpiritual ſongs during the melancholy which prey'd upon him. However, he grew ſo weak, that he was unable to repeat the name of God, when Viſtnou, mounted on the Garouda, came to his aſſiſtance, and gave him his weapons, made of diamonds, call'd Jeckeram. With theſe Indre Doumena knock'd the crocodile on the head, and drew near his deliverer, to thank him, who ſeeing him oppreſs'd with wearineſs, cured him of it with a ſingle touch. He then was reſtor'd to his former ſtate, and teſtified his gratitude to Viſtnou, by the worſhip and honours he paid him; and Viſtnou on the other ſide, granted a plenary indulgence to all ſuch as ſhould repeat this hiſtory.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Food and Faſtings of the Bramins.

THE two caſtes of the Settreas and of the Soudreas, eat fiſh and all kind of fleſh, that of the cow excepted; but the Bramins, who are more rigid obſervers of the law, and the Veinsjas their imitators, abſtain from every thing that has life. This abſtinence, which they have in common with the Pythagorean ſect, reſults very naturally from the doctrine of tranſmigration. 'Tis an evil action, ſay the Bramins, to diſlodge a ſoul from the body of an animal, where poſſibly 'tis more happy than it will be in the body, into which it will paſs after its exit from this. The Settreas juſtify their conduct, by ſaying, that human ſouls tranſmigrate into plants as well as into the bodies of animals; and that 'tis leſs criminal to kill one ſingle beaſt for the food of ſeveral perſons, than to root up ſeveral plants, or, which is the ſame, to diſlodge ſeveral ſouls for the feeding of one ſingle Bramin. To this the latter anſwer, that the ſouls incloſed in plants, don't loſe ſo much by their change of body, as thoſe which are drove from the moſt contemptible animal. Some of them agree, that it were indeed to be wiſh'd men could ſubſiſt without rooting up herbs and deſtroying them, but conclude, that 'tis an unavoidable evil. Others among them are ſo infatuated with theſe notions, that they endeavour to ſubſiſt wholly on leaves and fruits, and obſerve carefully not to touch any thing that might any way prejudice the plant; however 'tis certain, that very few are ſo very ſcrupulous on this head. The general opinion is, that if a man were oblig'd either to make choice of death or to eat fleſh, it were better for him to chuſe the latter, and afterwards atone for his involuntary fault by purifications.

As the Bramins are prohibited the eating fiſh and fleſh, and are not allow'd to ſubſiſt upon any thing but rice, roots, and herbs, in their ſeveral ſeaſons; they therefore feed upon nothing that may either provoke appetite, or prompt them to paſs thoſe bounds which frugality preſcribes. Water is their uſual drink, but they ſometimes take a little milk, and for this reaſon, ſuch of them as are in good circumſtances, always keep cows of their own. I have already obſerv'd that there are five ſins, the pardon whereof the Vedam declares are not to be obtain'd but with the utmoſt difficulty. Theſe are, 1*ſt*, For a man to lie with his mother. (N. B. under the word mother, a mother-in-law and the wife of a doctor are comprehended.) 2*d*, To kill a Bramin. 3*d*, To ſteal gold. 4*th*, To get drunk. And, 5*th*, To keep company with thoſe who are guilty of theſe crimes.

The Bramins have a kind of treat which laſts during the whole month of December. They riſe before the dawn, waſh themſelves, and preſent to their idol rice mix'd with a certain grain, ſugar and certain fruits. This entertainment is made in commemoration of the advantage that was antiently obtain'd by Pandeva, which is the common name that is given to five brethren, viz. Darmeraſou, Bimas, Naggula, Adjuna, Sahadeva, who were cotemporaries with Viſtnou, when he liv'd on the earth and went by the name of Kriſtna. Theſe five brethren had a kinſman, Duriodena by name, who was the eldeſt of an hundred and one brothers. Adjuna the fourth, unable to agree with Duriodena about the diviſion of certain lands, they reſolv'd to ſtake them on the chance of a dye: accordingly they play'd, but Duriodena having falſe dice, won the game. The five brethren ſtak'd their liberty, loſt it, and afterwards ventur'd their wife Draupeti and loſt her alſo. They ſtill continued playing tho' they had nothing left to loſe; and bound themſelves, in caſe they ſhould be loſers this time, to confine themſelves twelve years in the woods without once going near any city, and that the thirteenth they ſhould quite conceal themſelves from human eyes; and added this penalty, that that in caſe they ſhould fail in the laſt article, they ſhould be oblig'd to return into the woods, and continue in them twelve years longer. They play'd again, but loſt this game alſo. Duriodena, to inſult their affliction, endeavour'd to undreſs Draupeti before them, and to demean her like a ſlave who was entirely at his diſpoſal. However, ſhe held her clothes faſt, but it being impoſſible for her to ſtruggle much longer, ſhe recommended herſelf to Kriſtna, then at Metura, who heard her prayers notwithſtanding the great diſtance. But now, tho' ſhe no longer held her clothes, yet her new maſter, tho' he employ'd all his ſtrength, was not able to pull them off, ſo that he let her alone. Let us, ſays ſhe to him, play together, and in caſe I happen to loſe, my perſon ſhall be entirely at your diſpoſal. But now the falſe dice loſt all their virtue; and ſhe not only recovered her own liberty, but alſo that of the five brethren her huſbands. She was for playing on in order to win back the lands, but Duriodena had ſenſe enough to leave off. The five brethren made an ill uſe of their liberty, for they again ſtak'd it upon the ſame conditions as before, and happening to loſe, ſubmitted to what they were bound to perform. When the time was expir'd, they went to Duriodena, and ſaid to him as follows: Thou didſt win our lands with falſe dice, if thou art willing to divide them, let us do ſo; but if thou doſt rather chuſe playing, let us play, or otherwiſe let the fate of arms decide who ſhall poſſeſs them. Duriodena choſe the latter, and 'twas to no purpoſe that their common friends endeavoured to reconcile them; and each party pitch'd upon champions to ſupport their reſpective intereſts. Kriſtna ſaid, Let who will chuſe me, I am reſolv'd not to fight, and will only guide the chariot [a]. Duriodena finding that Kriſtna would not fight, but on the contrary ſeem'd inclin'd to favour one of the five brethren, did not value whether he was on his ſide or not. The battle began in December. They feaſted very plentifully before ſun-riſe, fought all day, and returned back together after ſun-ſet; this continued all the month long. Notwithſtanding that Duriodena was reinforc'd with all his brothers and friends, yet the five brethren recover'd their lands. 'Tis in commemoration of this battle, and of Kriſtna's and thoſe of his party's eating at this time, that the Bramins feaſt in this manner in December.

As the Bramins are prepoſſeſs'd of their ſuperiority over the reſt of the caſtes, they therefore refuſe to eat in any houſe but that of a Bramin, nor even ſo much as to drink a glaſs of water; but they don't ſcruple to drink ſome Tager, i. e. curdled milk, or cream, becauſe it is of the ſame nature with the Amortam. They won't even condeſcend to eat in the houſe of a Bramin who is of a different ſect from themſelves. No Bramin will allow another to ſee him eat, not even the king himſelf. If therefore one of theſe marries a wife of an inferior caſte, ſhe is not indulg'd the honour of ſeeing him eat; and in caſe he ſhould be ſo complaiſant as to give her that liberty, and it ſhould afterwards come to the ears of the other Bramins, they would immediately ſhun him as a baſe and unclean perſon.

Their faſts are fix'd to certain days, and are kept very ſtrict. They faſt the eleventh day after the full moon, and the eleventh after the new; and abſtain, during the ſixty hours of the day and night, from all kind of ſuſtenance, even betel itſelf, and employ all that time either in prayer or reading. Such of the Bramins and Soudras as are of the ſect of the Seivias, have a faſt which is peculiar to themſelves, viz. every Monday in November. They never eat a morſel of any thing till they ſee the ſtars in the ſky, or that the hour for their riſing is come. In the ſecond part we ſhall ſhew the reaſon of their faſting in this manner.

CHAP. XIII.

Cuſtoms obſerv'd during the Sickneſs, or at the Death of the Bramins; and of their Burial.

WHEN a Bramin falls ſick, tho' the veſſels be ever ſo much over-charg'd with blood, they yet always prefer abſtinence to bleeding; but then they frequently make him faſt ſo long, that he quite loſes the habit of eating, by which means he is unable to ſwallow, when they afterwards think proper to give him ſuſtenance.

When the ſymptoms of death appear, a Bramin is ſent for to pray with the ſick perſon, and alms are given to the poor. In the mean time, the ſick perſon is repeating continually the name of God, and when he is no longer able to do it, his friends ring it inceſſantly in his ears. The Vedam declares, that as God has promis'd to aſſiſt thoſe who think on his name, and repeat it, he is oblig'd to ſuccour them in this extreme; but in caſe their ſpeech fails them, and their friends do this office for them, 'tis the ſame thing as if they themſelves had perform'd it. If the ſick perſon is married, and his ſenſes are not yet gone, he asks his wife whether ſhe will be burnt or buried with him. If ſhe anſwers in the affirmative, ſhe is oblig'd to ſtand to her promiſe, and it then becomes her duty, becauſe of the oath by which ſhe bound herſelf at her marriage, in preſence of the Bramin and the fire Homan. She then had taken an oath, that her ſoul ſhould not be ſeparated from that of her husband, and ſhe could not, without being guilty of a great ſin, violate an oath which the preſence of the Bramin and the fire had made ſacred. In caſe ſhe has any children, and loves them better than ſhe did her deceas'd husband, then ſhe is at liberty either to live with them or die with him. If ſhe dreads the fire, ſhe muſt not be forc'd to throw herſelf into it, but the general opinion is, that no virtuous woman will refuſe to make herſelf a ſacrifice on this occaſion; for, according to the Vedam, the duty of a wife conſiſts in the three following particulars:

The firſt is, a blind and implicit complacency for all the deſires and wiſhes of her husband. The example of Draupeti, who was a complete model of virtue and patience, is quoted on this occaſion. Her husband deſtroy'd his health and conſum'd all his ſubſtance in maintaining ill women; diſeaſe, which is the juſt puniſhment inſeparable from ſo diſſolute a way of life, tho' it depriv'd him of ſtrength and vigour to continue it, did nevertheleſs permit his paſſions to rage with the ſame impetuoſity. He declar'd he ſhould die in caſe he was not indulg'd to frequent thoſe ſtrumpets, but the generous Draupeti reply'd, Do not grieve; I myſelf will carry you to them. Upon which ſhe took him on her back, and was carrying him to the place where they were, tho' the night was pitchy dark; but as ſhe was going along, ſhe ſtruck againſt a poſt or ſtake on which a holy man was fix'd, whoſe name was Gallova, and put him to ſome pain. The choleric ſaint inflam'd with anger, cry'd out, He who has put me to this pain ſhall die before the ſun riſe. But Draupeti, being reſolv'd not to loſe her husband, ſhe alſo cry'd out, The ſun ſhall not riſe; and accordingly it continued for ſeveral years under the horizon, whereupon mankind in general pray'd that it ſhould riſe again; when Brahma and the Devetas went to the woman above-mentioned, to gain her conſent, if poſſible, that it ſhould riſe again, and deſir'd to know what ſatisfaction ſhe demanded: but the only anſwer ſhe made was, My husband, my husband; upon which it was ſaid, This ſhall be granted thee in the next life. She died, and went towards [a] Surgam; then returning again into this world, married five husbands, who were the five five brothers above-mentioned: but as ſhe would have been polluted, had ſhe enjoy'd five men together, Brahma order'd that ſhe ſhould always enjoy one of them during a year, at the expiration of which ſhe ſhould fall into the fire, and cohabit with another husband according to her wiſhes.

The ſecond duty of a virtuous wife, is to obſerve a great modeſty and ſimplicity in her dreſs, and not to junket when her husband is out of town.

The third is to die when her husband leaves the world. However, ſome women before they marry, put in this clauſe, viz. that they [a] ſhall not be burnt with him, and oblige their husbands to ratify it; however, the Bramins, as was before obſerv'd, leave a woman, whom her husband asks in his expiring moments, whether ſhe is willing to follow him in death, at her liberty to anſwer either yes or no. They themſelves confeſs, that the forcing a woman to it, either by violence or threats, is a crime that merits hell. But the Settreas, who are the nobles, conſtrain their wives to ſubmit to this cruel cuſtom, who would think that their ſurviving them, would caſt a ſtain on their honour; and once a Settrea dying, threeſcore women threw themſelves on his funeral pile, and were there conſum'd.

They believe that when a ſick perſon is at the point of death, two [b] Jamma-doutas always appear to him, whoſe hideous figure terrifies him, but then a Viſtnou-douta is preſent at the ſame time. In caſe the dying man had led a virtuous life, the latter carries away his ſoul in a magnificent flying chariot; but if he had been a wicked wretch, one of the Jamma-doutas carries him to Jamma-locon, or the place where Jamma preſides. This judge orders his regiſter to acquaint him with the particulars of the life of the deceas'd, purſuant to the informations he had receiv'd from Viſtnou; when theſe being read, he ſends him back into the world, where he skips up and down like a hob-goblin for ten days together, till ſuch time as his doom is pronounced. 'Tis for this reaſon that the Bramins, after the death of a relation, feed a magpye for ten days, from a notion they entertain, that his ſoul may poſſibly be among thoſe birds.

As ſoon as the ſick man has given up the ghoſt, his beard is ſhav'd, he is waſh'd, is clothed in a clean ſuit, and his mouth is rubb'd with lime and pounded betel, and the women alſo rub it with raw rice. When he is carried from his houſe to ſome place adjacent to the city, he is attended by his friends, who waſh their hands and put a little rice on his mouth. They waſh their hands a ſecond time, and begin a Beteani round the pile on which his body lies; this Beteani is a kind of proceſſion which a Perrea makes, who is follow'd by certain perſons that beat on a little drum, when they go thrice round the corps. This being done, one of the company preaches to the reſt, in death's name, and obſerves that his empire equally extends over all things, over the young and old, rich and poor; that thoſe who lead a life of virtue ſhall be happy after death, but that ſuch as tread the paths of vice muſt expect nothing but torment.

All the Bramins are not burnt after their deaths, for ſome of them are buried. The Viſtnouvas and Smartas are always burnt, from an opinion which prevails among them, that tho' they have ſerv'd Viſtnou ever ſo faithfully, they yet contract certain impurities, which are thoroughly purg'd by fire. On the contrary, the Seivias and Sansjaſiis maintain, that their ſins will not be imputed to them, tho' they have not exactly fill'd up all the duties of life; conſequently that they have no occaſion for this purification, and therefore may be quietly laid in the ground. The one have an eye chiefly to God's juſtice, the other rely more on his mercy.

CHAP. XIV.

Of thoſe Women who are burnt or buried with their Husbands.

WHEN a woman has promis'd to follow her husband either to the funeral pile or the grave, he is no ſooner expir'd, but preparation is immediately made for the interment of both, nor can ſhe retract or ſuſpend the performance of her promiſe. She muſt be conſum'd on the ſame day and in the ſame fire in which her husband's body is burnt. The Bramins and Veinsjas are vaſtly rigorous on this article; but the Settreas allow their wives to burn themſelves at different times and in different places, when their husbands either died in a foreign country, or many years before.

Notice being given of the husband's death, the woman is ſet in a chair before the door, ſplendidly dreſs'd after the manner of the country. Then the inſtruments begin to ſtrike up, the drums beat, upon which betel is given her to chew, and ſhe is entertain'd with diſcourſe, for fear leſt by thinking too intenſely on her impending fate, it ſhould make her repent her choice. The Settreas and the Soudras mix ſomething with the betel, which has the property of benumbing all the ſenſes, and locking up the ſeveral faculties of the ſoul; but the Bramins, ſay they, never do this, becauſe they would have this ſacrifice a voluntary one.

At her leaving the houſe ſhe bids her friends farewel, having a citron or lemmon in one hand, and a looking-glaſs in the other, and is all the time repeating the name of God inceſſantly; ſome uſe the word Naraina, others Rañma, or ſome other name. If ſhe is of the caſte of the Bramins, or of the Veinsjas, ſhe then, inſtead of a lemmon and a looking-glaſs, holds ſome of thoſe red flowers in her hand which are ſtrew'd in the temple and before the idols, and 'tis neceſſary that theſe flowers ſhould have been preſented to it. An idol is alſo hung about her neck.

The woman being thus equip'd, walks on foot to the place where the corps of her husband was burnt, and if ſhe be of the caſte of the Settreas or that of the Soudras, ſhe is accompanied by her relations, who employ a great many exhortations, and cheer up her ſpirits; but if ſhe's the wife of a Bramin, ſhe is drawn on a kind of ſledge. Not far from the funeral pile is a pond, where ſhe goes and waſhes herſelf. They take off her jewels and other ornaments, when a Bramin prays by her, and alms are diſtributed among the Bramins. Being come out of the water, ſhe wraps herſelf up in a yellow ſhroud, and draws near to the pile. 'Tis rais'd in a pretty deep hole, the earth of which being all thrown on one ſide, forms by that means an eminence, on which ſhe aſcends. The wood with which the corps of her husband had been conſum'd, is half burnt, and caſts a dreadful blaze; but to prevent this ſight from terrifying her, they place a mat betwixt her and the fire, ſo that ſhe does not ſee it. 'Tis on this eminence that ſhe takes the laſt farewel of her relations, who all exhort her to behave with great bravery on this occaſion. She then takes ſome kitchen utenſils, ſuch as a Pilang or peſtle, to pound rice; a Soup or little fan, to winnow it after 'tis pounded, and toſſes them into the fire over the mat. She afterwards takes a pot full of oil, part of which ſhe pours on her head, repeating inceſſantly the name of God, when at laſt, the mat being taken away, ſhe throws herſelf into the fire with the pot of oil. She then is immediately cover'd with wood five or ſix foot deep, while others pour oil and butter on the fire to make it blaze the more. Sometimes, when the ſhe-ſlaves find their miſtreſs is greatly afflicted for the loſs of her husband, they promiſe her, in caſe ſhe is reſolv'd not to ſurvive him, to burn themſelves along with her, and are always as good as their words. There is leſs ceremony uſed upon their account; they dance near the funeral pile, and throw themſelves into it, one after another [a]. Thus have we deſcrib'd the manner in which the women of the three inferior caſtes burn themſelves.

The burning of the women of the firſt caſte, is accompanied with ſtill more barbarous circumſtances. Theſe aſcend the funeral pile, and lay themſelves down by the corps of their husbands, as if they were going to ſleep with them. Being plac'd, the funeral pile is raiſed over them; when the fire is ſet to that part of it that is neareſt their heads, on which oil and other unctuous ſubſtances had been pour'd, in order to make the fire ſooner catch the funeral pile, the wood whereof is of a coarſer or more precious kind, according to the condition and circumſtances of the deceaſed. Some of them uſe a wood call'd Aquila Brava, a ſort of aloe, which grows in the iſle of Ceilan and on the coaſts of Coromandel, and others employ [b] ſandal wood on theſe occaſions.

At Surat, over the funeral pile, a ſmall hut made of thick millet-ſtraw, entwin'd with ſmall wood, is rais'd; the woman goes into this hut, ſits down on the funeral pile, takes her husband's head into her lap, and puts fire to it with a torch which ſhe holds in her hand; while a great number of Bramins, with pokers in their hands, ſtir up the fire, which they alſo light on the outward part, and even puſh the woman forward, in caſe the dread of the fire ſhould make her attempt to leap out of it; but this does not any way correſpond with the liberty [c] which they pretend to indulge the women in on this occaſion.

The ſame preparations are made whether the woman is to be burnt or buried, but the circumſtances of the burial are different. When ſhe is come to the grave where the corps of her husband lies, ſhe goes down into it, and ſeats herſelf on a bench made of earth, which is made under a kind of vault dug in the earth. Having ſeated herſelf, ſhe takes the corps in her arms, throws incenſe into a fire that is juſt by her, and perfumes her body; this being done, they begin to fill the grave gently, and the woman draws the earth to her, and diſpoſes it about her with her hands. When ſhe is up to the neck in it, two of thoſe who fill up the grave, take a carpet and hold it before the grave to prevent her ſeeing what they are going to do. After this they give her poiſon in a ſhell, which ſhe ſwallowing down, they then twiſt her neck round, ſo very dextrouſly, that 'tis impoſſible for any of the ſpectators to perceive it, unleſs they happen to ſtand very near her. Both theſe infernal tragedies are exhibited to the ſound of inſtruments, the noiſe of drums, and the ſhouts of all the people preſent, which drown the cries of the unhappy victim; ſome of them devote themſelves to death with inexpreſſible reſolution.

Any woman that ſhould refuſe to die with her husband, would be look'd upon as a moſt infamous wretch; their hair is cut off, they are not allow'd to touch any betel, to wear precious ſtones, or marry again; but are expos'd to inſults of every kind: for which reaſon ſuch among them as are inform'd with heroic ſentiments, prefer death to ſo wretched a life. As they are incapacitated from enjoying the moſt inconſiderable trifle, and are not allow'd to have the leaſt honours paid them, they don't inherit the ſmalleſt portion of their husband's eſtate, but lie at the mercy of their eldeſt ſon who ſucceeds to it, and has an abſolute empire over them. If ſuch a woman has none but daughters, the inheritance devolves on her husband's brother, who is oblig'd only barely to maintain her and her daughters; but this they never fail to reproach her with ſo long as ſhe lives, and are often hitting her in the teeth with not loving her husband ſince ſhe had not the courage to die with him. Add to this their artful inſinuations, in aſſuring them that if they either burn or bury themſelves with their husbands, they will ſave their ſouls from hell, altho' they had a thouſand times deſerv'd to go thither; as alſo, that all ſuch who thus ſubmit to death out of pure love and affection, feel none of thoſe torments which the fire cauſes on other occaſions. Theſe things conſider'd, we may eaſily account for their devoting themſelves to death in this manner. To conclude, conclude, the ſtory of [a] Calanus, who liv'd in the time of Alexander the Great, not to mention ſeveral teſtimonies of antient authors, are a proof that the Indians have been long uſed to look upon ſo dreadful a death as a mere trifle.

CHAP. XV.

Of Mourning, and the Prayers for the Dead.

THE Bramins have various methods of expreſſing their ſorrow for the death of their relations. When one who was older than themſelves comes to die, they ſhave their beards and cut off their whiskers; abſtain from betel ten days, and eat but one meal a day during that term, which is preciſely the time that his ſoul may poſſibly be condemn'd to skip up and down the world. But in caſe the deceas'd were younger, they don't enjoin themſelves this penance; as their wives are always ſo, they are conſequently never oblig'd to mourn in this manner for them, much leſs for their children. The Soudras don't make this diſtinction, for they mourn for the young as well as the old, and not only ſhave their beards but alſo their heads, leaving only a tuft on the crown of it, and wrap the reſt with a punger, inſtead of a piece of linnen, which they commonly uſe for that purpoſe, and likewiſe abſtain from betel for three or four days. When a Soudras loſes a child, he neither has his beard or head ſhav'd, but deprives himſelf of betel for the three firſt days, and puts a punger about his head.

When any perſon in a houſe dies, all the bearded ſlaves ſhave themſelves; and if the deceaſed were a ploughman, of the family of the Vettalas, or of that of the Ambrias, which are the two principal among the Soudras, twelve ſorts of perſons are to pay him the laſt duties; viz. 1. The Bramins, who ſerve the pagods. 2. The Beteanis or Perreas, who beat the drum. 3. The Pannejevas, who play on long horn flutes. 4. The goldſmiths. 5. The carpenters. 6. The lockſmiths. 7. The Vaſſeris. 8. The barbers. 9. The Poumaliandes, who ſcatter flowers round the dead. 10. The Canapules, who are writers or ſecretaries. 11. The Salevadis. 12. The Kaicules or curtezans. But now the Bramins, the Canapules, and Poumaliandes, don't practiſe this cuſtom. A certain tax or duty is paid to all thoſe who come on this occaſion, and a Vaſſeri gives to each perſon preſent a punger, which they fix on their heads ſo as to let it hang half an ell down their backs. They proſtrate themſelves in the place where the alms, call'd [b] Nili, are beſtow'd.

The fire of the pile being out, they gather up the aſhes of ſuch of the bones as are not conſumed, and throw them into the Ganges; for the waters of that river being reputed very holy, are therefore of great comfort to the ſoul of the deceas'd. They alſo think they ſhall procure him an abundance of felicity, by building, purſuant to his laſt-will, Tampandals or huts in the high-ways, where all ſuch paſſengers as are a-thirſt have cold and warm water given them, or Canje, i. e. water in which rice has been boil'd, and ſometimes a few beans. If this be of no ſervice to the dead, 'tis not ſo with regard to the living; who in their journies in that very hot climate, would be almoſt ſpent, were it not for ſome ſuch refreſhment.

They often build pagods over the graves of the dead, but as they are thought to be impure, no religious act is therefore ever perform'd in them. We indeed meet with ſome figures, but theſe are not the object of any religious worſhip, and are at moſt no more than barely the images of ſuch perſons as were either burnt or buried in that place. If they pay them any honours, ſuch as the preſenting them victuals, or incenſing them, 'tis only with this view, viz. to engage the ſoul of the deceaſed, in caſe it be a Ratjasja or devil, not to do them any harm or frighten them in any manner. They alſo dig wells and Tanks for the ſervice of the publick, and imagine that the benefit which will thereby accrue to every individual, will be of advantage to the departed ſoul.

CHAP. I.

Of GOD, and the Creation of BRAHMA.

THE Viſtnouvas look upon Viſtnou as the ſovereign Deity, whom they alſo call Permal. Not to take notice of the almoſt numberleſs multitude of other names they give him, I ſhall only obſerve, that the Seyvias don't allow that ſovereignty which they aſcribe to Eſwara; however they unanimouſly believe there is but one God, and that Brahma created the world. Here follows the ſtory of the creation according to the Vedam.

When as yet nothing but God and the water exiſted, the ſupreme Being, deſirous to create the world for his own amuſement and pleaſure, caus'd the leaf of a tree, in the ſhape of a child, who plaid with its great toe in its mouth, to float on the water. From its navel there iſſu'd out a flower call'd Tamara, whence Brahma drew his original, who was greatly ſurpriz'd to ſee himſelf form'd and not to know by what power; but the divine Being clear'd up his doubts, and acquainted him with his origin. Brahma gave him ſuch ſtrong teſtimonies of his gratitude for what had been indulg'd him, that God was affected with it, and therefore gave him the power of creating the world.

Brahma had at firſt five heads; his mighty power elated him with pride, ſo that he forgot the reſpect and veneration he ow'd to Eſwara, who, in his anger, created Beirewa, chief of ſuch human ſouls as are chang'd into fluttering devils. Beirewa, to revenge the ſlighted God, ſplit one of Brahma's heads, viz. the middle one, with his nail. Brahma endeavour'd to appeaſe Eſwara by hymns which he compos'd in his praiſe, and the God, moved with his repentance, put the wounded head on his own, and promis'd Brahma that he ſhould live with four heads in as great credit as before. The Bramins are of opinion, that his pride is not yet quite rooted out; and aſſert, that when the world which now exiſts ſhall be deſtroy'd, and give way to that which is to ſucceed it, Brahma will be in an inferior ſtate to that he now enjoys, and that his place will be fill'd up by Annemonta, the faithful ſervant of Viſtnou.

Brahma did not only create the world, but alſo preſides over it with abſolute ſway; he alone is intruſted with the care of every particular being, for God does not give himſelf the trouble to ſuperintend over the leaſt thing in nature. Thus 'tis Brahma indulges with long life, and aſſigns to each individual his deſtiny, which is irreverſible: however, he is not ſingle, but has ſeveral ſubalterns, who have each their particular juriſdictions. The moſt conſiderable of his deputies is Devendre, who has command over all the chiefs of the eight worlds, and has alſo lieutenants in each of theſe eight worlds, which are ſeated over the globe inhabited by us. They call the laſt Bou-locon, i. e. the place below. That where Brahma reſides is the higheſt, which, however, is under the heavens, and is call'd Brahma-locon. One of theſe two worlds is ſituated towards the north, and the other towards the ſouth; the eight others lie between, and are rang'd according to the order of the winds. 1. Indre-locon, where Devendre preſides, who is alſo call'd [a] Indre. 2. Achni-locon. 3. Jamma-locon, which is hell. 4. Niruti-locon. 5. Warouna-locon. 6. Cubera-locon. 7. Wajouvia-locon. And, 8. Iſangja-locon.

Achni, Jamma, Niruti, Warouna, Cubera, Vajouvia, and Iſangja, all hold of Devendre, who is ſubordinate to Brahma. Theſe eight chiefs have each their particular functions: Achni preſides over the fire, Varouna over the water, Vajouvia over the winds, Cubera over riches, and ſo of the reſt.

CHAP. II.

Of the Wives of Viſtnou and Eſwara.

WE have ſeen in the firſt part, that when the mountain Merouva was whirled about in the ſea, the motion produced a foam which was like the cradle of a beautiful woman nam'd Latſami. This ſecond Venus was beſtow'd on Viſtnou, preferably to the Devetas, who were all in love with her. The Seyvias, who aſſert that Eſwara is the ſovereign God, ſay alſo, that he has a wife call'd Parvati. They tell us that ſhe had a double birth; firſt, ſhe was daughter to Datſja, ſon of Brahma, and of Saraſvati his wife. Her father gave her in marriage to Eſwara, and ſome time after intended to perform a Jagam or ſacrifice, to which he invited the Devetas, ſuch as Devendre, the ſun, the moon, and the reſt; but neglected Eſwara his ſon-in-law. Parvati told him he ſhould alſo have invited him, but he, inſtead of agreeing with her, made her the following injurious anſwer: Eſwara, ſays Datſja, is not worthy of that honour; he is a fellow that ſubſiſts only on alms, and has no clothes to put on. We are to ſuppoſe that Eſwara was at that time incog. and veil'd under ſuch a ſhape as made him unknown to all. Parvati inflam'd with rage, cried out to her father, I myſelf am therefore not worthy to aſſiſt at it; and ſaying theſe words, ſhe leap'd into the fire that was prepar'd for this ſolemnity. Eſwara, exaſperated in the higheſt degree at this unhappy accident, was all over in a ſweat, and one of the drops of it happening to fall on the earth, Virrepadra ſprung from it, who immediately ask'd his father, what commands he had for him. Eſwara bid him go and deſtroy the Jagam of Datſja, and was obey'd, for he kill'd ſome of the gueſts, drove away others, cut off Datſja's head, kick'd the ſun and broke all his teeth, ſo that he has not one left at this time; and drubb'd the moon ſo heartily, that her face was cover'd all over with the marks of the blows he gave her, which continue to this day. The Devetas's implor'd Eſwara's mercy, and obtain'd it; he was ſoftned by their intreaties, and reſtor'd Datſja to life, on whoſe body he fix'd the head of a he-goat inſtead of his own. Parvati being conſum'd in the fire into which ſhe had thrown herſelf, was indulg'd a new birth, birth, and was daughter of the mountain Chimawontam, who married her to Eſwara; her husband was ſo paſſionately in love with her, that he gave her half his body, ſo that ſhe became half man and half woman, for which reaſon the Bramins call her Ardhanari-Eſwara; a name, implying ſuch an union.

Theſe people are of opinion, that both Viſtnou and Eſwara can procreate children without the commerce of the other ſex, ſince they aſcribe to them a power of getting them by the bare act of the will, ſo that they ſuppoſe they only have them for dalliance ſake. Eſwara is repreſented in the temples under a very immodeſt ſhape, expreſſing the union of both ſexes in an act, which modeſty will not allow me to explain farther. This is grounded on a tradition which the Bramins themſelves are partly aſham'd of, and is as follows: It fell out one day that a Moniſwara came to viſit Eſwara in a place where the latter uſed to careſs Parvati. The Moniſwara came at a very unſeaſonable hour; in vain the porter ſhut the gate upon him, and even told him the reaſon why he could not be admitted, for the Moniſwara was ſo enrag'd to find he muſt be forced to ſtay till Eſwara ſhould pleaſe to ſhew himſelf, that he broke out into an imprecation, which he immediately repented of. Eſwara had overheard him, but pardon'd him when he found he was ſorry for it. The Moniſwara not ſatisfy'd with being pardon'd for his offence, requeſted that all who ſhould worſhip the image of Lingam, which is that figure repreſenting the union of the ſexes in the manner above-mention'd, ſhould reap greater advantages from it than if they were to worſhip Eſwara when repreſented with his whole body. He obtain'd his deſire, and 'tis to this circumſtance that thoſe ſcandalous images, under which Eſwara is worſhip'd in the pagods, owe their original; but he is repreſented under the figure of a man, in that ſtatue of him which is carried about in public.

CHAP. III.

Of the ten corporeal Shapes which Viſtnou aſſum'd.

THE Viſtnouvas believe that Viſtnou had ten different births.

1*ſt*, [a] Like Matja, or a fiſh; for a devil having carried off the four parts of the Vedam, threw himſelf into the ſea with his booty, when immediately Viſtnou changing himſelf into a fiſh, purſued and kill'd him.

2*d*, Like Courma, or a tortoiſe; for the mountain Merouva being thrown into the ſea, in ſearch of Amortam, 'twas ſo prodigiouſly heavy, that the world, unable to ſupport the weight of it, was beginning to ſink into the abyſs, when immediately Viſtnou transform'd himſelf into a tortoiſe, and took the world on his back.

3*d*, Like Warraha, or a hog. Among the idols of Viſtnou, in a pagod in the city of Trimottam, near Zinzi, is the head of a hog, which the Bramins aſſert to have come out of the earth; they pay very great honours to it.

4*th*, Under the ſhape of a Naraſimha, or a half man and half lion.

5*th*, Under the name of Vainana, a young Bramaſari, born of the ſame mother as Devendre, who gain'd a victory over Belli, which we ſhall mention hereafter.

6*th*, Under the name of Paresje-Rama, who was a Settrea.

7*th*, Under the name of Dajerrata-Rama; and the reaſon of his aſſuming that ſhape, is as follows: Ravana and Kompacarna, ſons of Caſſiopa, being now become Ratjasjas or devils, were as miſchievous as they were powerful. Theſe ſubdu'd the whole world, and afterwards went and declared war with Devendre, but Ravana was not able to vanquiſh vanquiſh him. In his grief and confuſion he made a requeſt to Eſwara, who granted him the following privilege: That he ſhould neither be kill'd, nor be ſubdued by the chiefs of the ſeven worlds ſeated under heaven, but, on the contrary, ſhould be victorious over them. He did not ſtand ſo much in awe of men, as to be forc'd to pray that they might not be allow'd to take away his life. Eſwara promis'd him alſo two hundred lakes of years, i. e. a life of twenty millions of years. Kompacarna likewiſe made a wiſh, and requeſted the ſame indulgence as his brother, together with a grant of ſleeping ſix months, and of being afterwards awak'd every day. Eſwara granted him alſo, that on the day he wak'd he ſhould overcome all thoſe againſt whom he waged war, not excepting Eſwara himſelf. The two brothers, extremely well ſatisfy'd with what they had obtain'd, built ſeven caſtles, the firſt of which was of gold, the ſecond of ſilver, the third of copper, the fourth of iron, and ſo on. They fell upon Devendre and the other chiefs, whom they took priſoners, and carried their inſults to ſuch a pitch, that Brahma acquainted Viſtnou with all the complaints which were made on that account; upon which he reſolv'd to owe his birth to a Settrea, Deſſeratha by name, in the city of Ajot-ja. This Settrea, tho' he had three wives, had no children by any of them, and had therefore been adviſ'd to prepare a ſacrifice in order to remedy this barrenneſs. The fire Homan being lighted, a man was ſeen to iſſue out of it, having a baſon in his hand, fill'd with rice boil'd in milk, with butter and ſugar, who commanded him to take it and give ſome of it to his wives. The Settrea obey'd, but divided it into two parts only, one of which he gave to Kauſal-ja and the other to Kaica. Theſe two women gave ſome of it to the third, named Somitra. They all became fruitful. Kauſal-ja brought forth Viſtnou, who was named Ramma; Kaica was deliver'd of Bharata; and Somitra had two ſons, who were call'd Latſmana and Settrugna, the firſt of which adher'd to Ramma, and the ſecond to Bharata. In proceſs of time they married, and Ramma had a wife named Sita. Kaica having done ſomething that pleaſed her husband vaſtly, he engaged himſelf to grant her whatever ſhe ſhould ask. She deſir'd that Ramma ſhould be oblig'd to go and live for twelve years in the woods, and that her ſon ſhould be a prince. Ramma taking his wife and his dear Latſmana along with him, ſet out in obedience to his father's commands. 'Twas with grief that Bharata heard what his mother had obtain'd in his favour, ſo that he would have kept him back, and endeavour'd to get the ſentence which had paſs'd upon him revers'd; but Ramma oppos'd it, and made him conſent that their father's commands ſhould be obey'd. Accordingly he ſet out, and became the tenant of the woods, where he was the terror of the wicked and the ſupport of the good. During his reſidence there, Ravana the devil hearing that Sita, Ramma's wife, was a miracle in beauty, he commanded a devil to aſſume the ſhape of a golden ſtag, and he was immediately obey'd; when he appearing before Sita, ſhe beſought her husband to let her have him. Ramma immediately purſued the ſtag, which taking to his heels, drew him at a great diſtance from the place where he had left his wife. Immediately Ravana preſented himſelf before her, under the ſhape of a Sanjaſi, and ask'd alms of her, and afterwards drawing near her upon the ſame pretence, he ſeiz'd and carried her off. He endeavoured to conquer her reſiſtance by good uſage, for a ſaint had told he ſhould die in caſe he forced her. Ramma being return'd, was prodigiouſly ſurpriz'd not to find his wife, when he met with the bird Tataw, mortally wounded, who told him that he had fought againſt Ravana, who had forced her away. If you, ſays the bird, ſhould purſue him alone, you'll loſe your labour; but go towards that mountain, and you there will meet with the ape Suggriva, who is flying from his enemies, take him into your ſervice. Ramma follow'd his advice; he met with Annemonta, who engag'd in his intereſt, becauſe he perceiv'd a light ſhining on the face of Ramma, and that of his brother, which ſtruck him with awe. They met with the ape Suggriva, who join'd himſelf to them, and after they had reveng'd him of his enemies by their overthrow, he was declar'd chief of the apes. They afterwards advanc'd towards [a] Ramacovil in their way to [b] Lanca; but, as there were ſeveral floods in their paſſage, the ape was commiſſioned to bring mountains and to throw them into the ſea, in order to make a bridge with them, which he accordingly perform'd. Now the raviſher had a brother, Viphiſena by name; who acquainted him with the danger they were in; I am inform'd, ſays he to him, that Ramma is a God; reſtore his wife to him. Ravana laugh'd at his advice, when Viphiſena ſeeing him obſtinately bent to perſiſt in his reſolution, abandon'd him and went over to Ramma, who took him into his ſervice; after this they beſieg'd Lanca, when various battles enſuing, Ravana was at laſt put to death and his brother put into his place, after which Sita was reſtor'd to her husband. Ramma, unwilling that this bridge ſhould be of ſervice to any other perſon, broke it down, by throwing ſeveral of thoſe mountains into the ſea of which it was form'd; and built a pagod in Ramacovil in honour of Eſwara, with this indulgence, that whoever ſhould viſit it ſhould obtain the remiſſion of all their ſins. 'Tis in commemoration of this ſucceſs that Ramma is repreſented, in all the pagods of Eſwara, with ten heads and twenty hands.

8th, The eighth appearance of Viſtnou under the name of Kriſtna, the reaſon of which will be given when we mention the feaſt of Gogolaſtemi, redounded, as the Bramins tell us, more to his glory, and was more wonderful than any of the reſt. At his former deſcents upon earth, he uſed only to bring a ſpark of his divinity along with him, but on this occaſion he appear'd in all the pomp and majeſty of it, inſomuch that heaven itſelf was emptied.

9th, He took the name of Bouddha.

10th, And laſtly, he aſſum'd the ſhape of Kelki, or a horſe. The author from whom we borrowed theſe names, does not inform us on what occaſion they were given.

CHAP. IV.

The Origin of the Bird Garrouda, and of Anniemonta.

Kadrouva-Vinneta and Diti, two of the wives of Caſſiopa, who was the firſt Bramin, happening to be walking in a garden, a little way out of the city, they perceiv'd Outſeirevan, the horſe of Indre. Diti in admiration cry'd out, How beautiful! how white this horſe is! he has not ſo much as the leaſt black ſpot about him! Her companion affirm'd that he had a black ſpot near his tail; upon which they fell to diſputing, and laid a wager, the conditions whereof were, that ſhe who loſt ſhould be the other's ſlave. As it was then night, they ſuſpended the examination till the next day; but Kadrouva-Vinneta, whoſe ſons were devils under the ſhape of ſerpents, taking advantage of the night, commanded one of them to go and place himſelf near the horſe's tail, ſo that the next morning a little black ſpeck was ſeen upon it. Diti, who knew nothing of the trick, ſubmitted to her companion, and was as holy and pious as the other was wicked: but the ſaints comforted her in her affliction, with this aſſurance, that ſhe ſhould bring forth children who would be her deliverers; and accordingly ſhe conceiv'd, and laid two eggs. She waited a long time in expectation of their being hatch'd, but growing impatient, ſhe broke one of them, whence iſſued a child with only the upper part of its body, the reſt not being yet form'd. Annura, for that is the

[a] 'Tis call'd by the Portugueze, Ramanacor, and is an iſland, between the weſtern peninſula of Indus, and the iſland of Ceylan.

[b] By the country of Lanca the Bramins underſtand the iſland of Ceylan and the kingdom of Achem, which, according to them, antiently made but one iſland.

the name of the immature babe, was very angry with his mother for having been the cauſe of his deformity, and aſſur'd her ſhe would continue in ſlavery five hundred years longer, for her not ſtaying till the egg had hatch'd itſelf. He enter'd into the ſervice of the ſun, flew up into the air, and undertook to guide the chariot. Five hundred years after, the other egg being hatch'd, Garrouda iſſued out of it, who went and ſerv'd Kadrouva-Vinneta and her children. Diti growing weary of her ſervitude, Garrouda ask'd her why they were ſlaves, and if there were no poſſibility of their getting free? Yes, there is, ſays ſhe, provided you will go and fetch the Amortam which is kept in Devendre-locon. Garrouda no ſooner heard theſe words than he flew away, and went in ſearch of the Amortam, which he got poſſeſſion of, after having conquer'd the Devetas who guarded it, and put out the fire which ſurrounded it. 'Twas to no purpoſe that they intreated him not to force it away, it being a truſt; however he aſſur'd them, that after he ſhould have made uſe of it to reſcue his mother out of ſlavery, they then might have it again if they thought proper. But he requeſted of Devendre, that he might be allow'd to eat the ſerpents, which accordingly was granted him. He then ſet out, in order to return to his mother; but the treacherous Kadrouva-Vinneta ſeiz'd on the Amortam, and reſolv'd that ſhe and her ſons ſhould drink it. Immediately Devendre ſent a Deveta, under the ſhape of a Bramin, who going to her, ſaid as follows: Take care how you profane this drink, by not taking it with the preparations requiſite. You muſt firſt waſh your Body, and put on ſuch clothes as are pure. Kadrouva-Vinneta cauſed the Amortam to be laid on a kind of ſtraw, called Arpbha, which is of a very holy nature, and that they in the mean time ſhould go and purify themſelves. In the mean time the Amortam was carried off, ſo that only a few drops remain'd of it on the ſtraw. The ſerpents, after their return, fell to licking it, and the ſtraw being very ſharp, cut their tongues; ſince which time the tongues of ſerpents have always been forked. The beak of the Garrouda having touch'd the Amortam, became white, and alſo its neck; and Viſtnou made choice of this bird to carry him, in the ſame manner as the Greeks and Romans relate that Jupiter was mounted on an eagle. The Garrouda is the Vahanam, or ordinary vehicle of Viſtnou; the Baſwa or ox, that of Eſwara; and the Ampſa, a bird reſembling a teal, that of Brahma.

Nor is the origin of the Annemonta, which is properly the wind, leſs wonderful. Whilſt Viſtnou liv'd under the name of Ramma, in order to wage war with Ravana, an ape called Keſſeri had a female named Augena, who, tho' ſhe had no commerce with her male conſort, brought forth an extraordinary kind of Ape; who, the moment after he was whelp'd, engag'd in the intereſts of Viſtnou. The great ſervices he did him in the expedition of Lanca, were rewarded by his having a little pagod erected in his honour, within that of Viſtnou; and he attends on him in the ſame quality upon earth, as Garrouda does in heaven.

When Viſtnou withdrew from the world, after having reſided in it under the ſhape of Ramma, all the people of Ajot-ja were for following him; but Ramma told them, they could not aſcend into heaven with their bodies, but that if they were deſirous of accompanying him, they muſt leave them in the Serriou, a river which runs near Ajot-ja. Theſe gave credit to what he ſaid, and follow'd him with the new bodies with which they had been clothed after death. Annemonta was not allow'd this privilege, but was oblig'd to remain upon earth, with this promiſe however, that he ſhould live as long as Brahma; and that when the world ſhall be renew'd, he ſhall ſucceed him, and that Brahma will then come and take his place.

Garrouda and Annemonta are worſhip'd by the Viſtnouvas, but the Seyvias honour the ſons of Eſwara. The firſt is Wigneſwara, whom ſome make the ſon of Parvati, while others aſſert, that he is brought forth by the bare act of Eſwara's will. The ſecond is Virrepadera, whom Eſwara begot in his anger, to puniſh his father-in-law Dats-ja. Beirewa is the third, whom he likewiſe begot in his wrath, in order to revenge himſelf on Brahma for his inſupportable pride and haughtineſs; and who exerciſes juſtice in this world over ſuch fluttering devils as were once human ſouls. The fourth is Comara-Swami, ſon of Eſwara and Parvati. Nandi, who is alſo called Baſwa and Baſanna, is the fifth, and is honoured under the ſhape of an ox. The ſun and moon have alſo their particular worſhip.

CHAP. V.

Of the four Ages of the World, according to the Bramins.

THE Bramins aſcribe four ages to the world: the firſt they call Critaigom, the ſecond Traitagom, the third Dwaparugom, and the fourth Kaligom. The three firſt are already paſt, and we are now in the fourth, 4831 years whereof are already elapſed, this preſent year 1731. The duration of the firſt was one million, ſeven hundred twenty-eight thouſand years; the ſecond, one million, two hundred ninety-two thouſand years; the third, eight hundred ſixty-four thouſand years; which, added to thoſe already paſt of the fourth age, amount in all to three millions, eight hundred eighty-eight thouſand, eight hundred, and thirty-one years, from the creation, according to this calculation. They have aſcrib'd various degrees of virtue to the four ages, and aſſert, that all things are continually degenerating; which correſponds with the golden, the ſilver, the braſs, and iron ages of the Poets. The univerſe, ſay they, is like an egg, which includes the heaven, the earth, and the abyſs. They ſuppoſe that heaven contains various worlds, and [a] Bartrouherri has number'd fourteen, which are all comprehended in that egg. The eight which have been already ſpoken of, are under the heaven where Brahma reſides, and go by the general name of Surgam; ſo that inſtead of ſaying a man is dead, they ſay he is gone to Surgam. Theſe worlds are over the globe inhabited by us, and are called Bou-locon. Over Surgam is Brahma-locon, and over that Kailaſom, Lilaveicontam and Veicontam, in which three places God himſelf reſides. They place Patalam or the abyſs, under Bou-locon. In the middle of Bou-locon, they feign a mountain, whoſe ſummit riſes higher than the eight worlds, and the foot of it deſcends beneath Patalam. This mountain, which is the ſame with Merouwa that was mention'd when we related the diſcovery of the Amortam, is of pure gold; and the revolution of the ſun, moon and ſtars round it, occaſions the difference of day and night. Tho' gold is not of a nature proper to nouriſh trees, the mountain Merouwa is nevertheleſs cover'd with fruits which have this property, that whoever eats of them, is never hungry or a-thirſt, or ſubject to the inconveniencies of old age. But theſe delicious climes were not made for men to reſide in, but are reſerv'd for the ſons of Diti the wife of Caſſiopa.

Bou-locon is divided into ſeven worlds, each of which has its ſea round it. That in the center floats in a ſea of freſh water, the ſecond in a ſea of milk, the third in a ſea of butter, the fourth is ſurrounded with a ſea of curdled milk, the fifth with a ſea of wine, the ſixth with one of ſyrup, and the laſt, which is ours, with a ſea of ſalt water. Each of theſe worlds borrows its name from the ſea with which it is ſurrounded.

[b] This world will have an end, but 'tis as yet far remov'd, for a thouſand revolutions of four ages, make no more than one of the days of Brahma's life, who, 'tis ſaid, will

[a] This is an Indian ſage, whoſe proverbs are had in great eſteem.

[b] We need not remind the reader, that this ſyſtem of the four ages of the world, according to the Bramins, is very different from that of the Banians in the preceding diſſertation. This difference is alſo found in the circumſtances of the creation. 'Tis manifeſt that both thoſe people have imbib'd their notions from the ſame ſource, viz. from the doctrine of the antient Egyptians, which probably both have diſguiſed after their own mode. All human inſtitutions are liable to change; and to ſay the truth, one age has as much right to invent tenets as another, when they are only the product of a wild and romantic imagination.

will certainly live an hundred years, each day of which is of the length above-mention'd; and in 1639 they computed he was but fifty years of age, and that he was then entring into his fifty-firſt year. The firſt month, and the firſt day, after the expiration of theſe hundred years, the world will be conſum'd by fire. The ſun, who now lends us only a few of his rays, will then dart them all at once on the earth. The ſea will be dry'd up, the mountains will crumble into duſt, after which the rains will deſcend with violence, in the ſame manner as the water ruſhes out of an elephant's trunk, and then Brahma will give up the ghoſt.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Devetas, and ten Ratjasjas.

THE Devetas, who are happy and beneficent intelligences, did not all ſpring from the ſame original. Brahma created the ſun, the moon, and the ſtars, which are all ſo many Devetas. He alſo created others for the more immediate ſervice of the Deity, ſuch as Wiſtnoudouta and Sevadouta, who are both ſervants, the former of Viſtnou, the latter of Eſwara. Caſſiopa the firſt Bramin, had not reaſon to be equally ſatisfy'd with his children. Thoſe he had by his wife Aditi were agreeable to God, who rank'd them among the Devetas; and their number is increaſed by the ſouls of ſuch men as die after having led holy lives.

Brahma alſo created Ratjasjas, or unhappy and noxious intelligences, among which are the Jammadoutas or ſervants of Jamma, and certain others. The children which Caſſiopa had by his wife Aditi, were all Ratjasjas, which is alſo the fate of all ſuch as have led a life of guilt. Theſe are all condemn'd to flit up and down, to be oppreſs'd with hunger and thirſt. They cannot enjoy any thing that is given them by men, and therefore often aſſume a human ſhape, in order to beg alms. Beireva, who is their chief, does not allow them ſo much as to tear up a ſingle blade of graſs.

Such Ratjasjas as were once men, have no longer the power to hurt, and are no more than a ſett of wretched beings; but the children of Aditi are very powerful, and hurt even the Devetas. Some of theſe are even in Surgam, but they cannot ſoar up ſo high as Brahma-locon, much leſs to Weicontam, where the divine Being reſides corporally. From their unwieldy and miſhapen bodies, there exhales an inſupportable ſtench. They are Anthropophagi or man-eaters, have children, and are ſubject to death: they aſſemble in the iſland of the Andamans, ſituated to the ſouth of Pegu.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Pagods, and religious Worſhip.

THE diviſion of the nation between Viſtnou and Eſwara, gave riſe to the building of pagods in honour of both theſe deities. As their ſects live together in the ſame place, there is not a ſingle city but has one temple at leaſt dedicated to each of them. Theſe are built with very lofty ſpires, and are larger and more finely embeliſh'd than thoſe pagods which are erected in honour of the inferior divinities. But this is not the only diſtinction between the pagods; there is likewiſe another which is founded on the degree of holineſs, they not being all equally ſacred. Here follows the principal in the kingdom of Carnate.

Jocketena,

Jocketena, a very lofty and very beautiful pagod at Madura; that of Sriringam, at Trifinapoli; that of Vaderafou, at Vifnou-Canje; and that of Vire-ragna, at Trivelour: thefe four are dedicated to Viftnou. The following are in honour of Efwara, who is there ador'd under the figure of the five elements: at Seva-Canje, the pagod call'd Ekaubranata, for the earth call'd Pratevi; at Trivanakavere, the pagod Jembounateſwara, for the water call'd Apou; at Trinamula, the pagod Aranajat-Eſwara, for the fire nam'd Tſejem; at Kaliſt, the pagod Kaleſt-Eſwara, for the wind call'd Waijou; at Settamberam, the pagod Settamberam-Eſwara, for the air call'd Akasjem: there is alſo the pagod Winket-Eſwara at Tripeti.

The Bramins are very ingenious in heightning the fame and reputation of their pagods, and have a fruitful imagination for the invention of prodigies, in order to engage the devotees in their worſhip. In the pagod of Trifinapoli is kept the original image which Brahma himſelf ſerv'd. He gave it to the anceſtors of Ramma, who had it by ſucceſſion, and made a preſent of it to Viphiſena brother to Ravana; the occaſion of which was as follows:

Ramma, after they had ended the war which they had waged againſt this Ratjasja, perceiving that it was with regret he left him to go and live in his dominions of Lanca, gave him this image to comfort him, commanding him to worſhip it agreeably to his intentions; upon this condition however, that he ſhould never ſet it on the ground, but on that ſpot where he intended it ſhould always continue. Being one day at Sriringam, he had occaſion to make water, when Vicgneſwara, ſon of Eſwara and Parvati, aſſuming the ſhape of a Bramaſari, preſented himſelf before him at that very inſtant. Viphiſena beſought him to hold the image, till ſuch time as he had ſatisfy'd nature; which the other promis'd, upon condition that he ſhould not be above half an hour: but Viphiſena was full two hours, whereupon the counterfeit Bramaſari ſet down the image. Viphiſena having done that very moment, he beat him, and endeavour'd to lift up the image, which open'd its mouth, and bid him not remove it from that place; but to compenſate his loſs, it told him, he might come every day from Lanca and pay him homage, which he might eaſily perform, as he was a giant and a Ratjasja. The Poranes or chronicles relate, that he uſed to go regularly to it every day, bringing flowers with which he adorn'd the image, inſtead of thoſe which the Bramins had laid there. They ſay further, that as no one could poſſibly find out how thoſe flowers came to be chang'd, a Bramin, in order to diſcover the matter, ſhut himſelf up in the pagod, and ſaw what he did. The Bramins pretend that he ſtill comes there once every year.

As Viphiſena tarry'd ſo long before his return, there was a myſterious reaſon for his ſo doing. During the continuance of the world which preceded this, ſeven rivers, viz. the Ganges, Jimmena, Godaveri that flows near Narſapour, Saraſvati, Marmada, Tſindou, and Cavari, happening to meet together, diſputed for pre-eminence. Five of them gave it up, but Cavari would not. The Ganges went and proſtrated itſelf at the feet of God, who was ſo much the more inclin'd to favour him, as five had already allow'd him the ſuperiority he ſtickled for. But Cavari made a very ſeaſonable vow, which was ſo agreeable to that God, that he promiſed to come into his boſom. 'Twas in order that this promiſe might be perform'd, that Viphiſena was prevented making water ſo long, in order that the patience of the Bramaſari being worn out, he might ſet the image on the ground, which by that means would be confin'd at Sriringam, a place ſurrounded with the waters of the river Cavari.

The pagods erected in honour of Viſtnou and Eſwara, are more lofty and ſpacious than thoſe of the inferior divinities; but they are not to be compar'd to our churches. Thoſe buildings are flat, but the ſpires are very lofty, and among the reſt, that of the pagod which ſtands in the neighbourhood of Tegnepatram, which generally goes by the name of the white pagod.

Theſe pagods conſiſt of three parts: the firſt is a vaulted roof, ſupported on ſtone columns; it lies open, and all perſons without diſtinction are allow'd to enter it. Some images are within, which are placed for ornament ſake, and to repreſent ſome incident in the Poranes or chronicles, under ſymbolical figures. Theſe are elephants, oxen, horſes, &c. and are made of wood. Some of theſe are carried with great ſolemnity through the ſtreets on certain days. The ſecond part is open in the day-time, and ſhut at night; but the Bramins who ſerve and attend in the pagods, forbid the entrance of it to all but themſelves. 'Tis fill'd with groteſque and monſtrous figures, of men with many heads, and a great number of arms. The third, which is a kind of chancel, is ſhut up with a very ſtrong gate. 'Tis here that the ſtatue of Viſtnou, in the ſhape of a man with four arms, is placed; or that of Eſwara, under the figure of Lingam, or that of a man; but in this caſe he is repreſented with three eyes, viz. two in their natural place, and the third in the middle of the forehead. A great number of lamps burn day and night before theſe idols.

This edifice ſtands in the midſt of a green that is ſurrounded with a wall, within which are pagods which are uſually plac'd round thoſe of Eſwara or Viſtnou. Thoſe of the latter have generally thoſe of Laſtemi his wife, of Garrouda and Annemonta near them. 'Tis very proper for Garrouda to be placed in the pagod of Viſtnou, he being his Vahaman; Anemonta, whom they repreſent with an ape's head, becauſe, ſay they, he was whelp'd in this manner, is ſometimes on the outſide. Near the little pagod dedicated to Garrouda, ſtands a kind of maſt, on which ſeveral ſticks are nail'd; he himſelf is repreſented under an human ſhape, with wings on each ſide. The Bramins, who rank him among the red ſparrow-hawks, and pay him very great honours, might poſſibly have borrowed this ſuperſtition from the Egyptians who had the ſparrow-hawk in great [a] veneration, and always puniſh'd thoſe with death who kill'd one of thoſe birds, tho' it were by chance. In the green where the pagod ſtands, is a ſtone bucking-tub, in which the plant Tolege is ſet.

The pagod of Eſwara ſtands alſo on a green ſurrounded with a wall, having ſeveral other pagods within it, viz. thoſe of Parvati his wife, of Suria, of Chindeca, of Comaraſwari, and of Nandi or Baſwa. The laſt is repreſented under the ſhape of an ox as big as the life, and made of blue ſtones. Baſwa, who is Eſwara's Vahaman, is ever with him. Schendra or the moon, has no particular pagod, but ſhe is always over Eſwara's head.

The cuſtom of placing figures of the moon over-head is of great Antiquity. The Moabites uſed to adorn the necks of their camels therewith, [b] as we read in the book of Judges; and the creſcent of the Mahometans poſſibly owes its original to this. The pagod of Eſwara has likewiſe two other ſtatues in it, viz. that of Vicgneſwara, which is alſo call'd Pullari and Vinnaiki. He is repreſented with the body of a gor-belly'd man, and the head, the trunk, and one of the tuſhes of an elephant. The other is that of Virreparda, which has one head, but a great number of arms, all graſping weapons: he is ſometimes imag'd with no leſs than thirty-two arms.

Whenever the Bramins go upon the green, they, out of reſpect, always obſerve to have the pagod to their right; and before they enter it, they always leave their ſhoes at the door, and throw an upper garment over their ſhoulders, as tho' it were a cloak.

For the maintenance of the pagod, there is a duty laid on all goods imported and ſold in the city, and a kind of poll-tax which is levied on the ſeveral families.

The perquiſites ariſe from the offerings of the pilgrims, who come in ſhoals to the pagod, on ſuch days as are ſacred to it; as for inſtance, that of Tripeti, a few days journey diſtant from Paliacate, has three feſtivals every year; one in September, on which the Soudras particularly, and the inferiour ſort of people meet there; the ſecond in December, on which the Bramins aſſemble from all parts; and the third, whoſe ſtated ſtated time is not mention'd by Mr. Roger, does not produce a leſs revenue than the former. The yearly perquiſites of this pagod amount to ſixty or eighty thouſand * pagods, which we are told is much leſs than formerly; conſequently it muſt, in thoſe days, have amounted to prodigious ſums.

The antient kings uſed to glory in increaſing the treaſures of the pagods, but King Veincapati happening to be in want of money, and unwilling to incur the odium of having plunder'd the ſacred treaſure, took the money that was depoſited therein, and gave a promiſſory note for the payment of it, when the ſtate of his affairs ſhould permit him to do it. Rama-Develo his ſucceſſor, had not ſo much probity, but was for ſeizing the jewels, and among the reſt a crown of gold, enrich'd with rubies and diamonds, which was on the head of the idol. But thoſe who had given him this wicked counſel, died at the foot of the mountain on which the pagod ſtands, and were ſoon after follow'd by the king himſelf.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Idols, and their Worſhip.

DIVINE worſhip among the Bramins does not, as with the Chriſtians, conſiſt in aſſemblies of people who meet regularly to pray, hear ſermons, and ſing the praiſes of God. There are certain nights on which the image of Viſtnou, and others on which that of Eſwara are carried in proceſſion through the city. This ceremony is perform'd monthly in honour of Eſwara, on the day of Amavali, or the firſt day the moon does not appear; and the ninth after the new moon, viz. the day of Jecca-deſi, in honour of Viſtnou. Here follows the manner of this proceſſion:

The image of this God is ſet on a prauncing horſe carv'd in wood, ſtanding only on his hind legs, which are fix'd in the board whereon he is carried. The men who carry this machine upon their ſhoulders, don't walk ſtrait forward, but wheel up and down, in imitation of the pacing of a horſe in the Manege or riding-houſe. Torches are carried before the idol, who has a Sombreiro or umbrello over its head: by the horſe's ſide is a man, who fans the idol, and drives away the flies. When they have gone their rounds they place it again in the pagod, when a ſett of young proſtitutes, conſecrated to the latter, dance in honour of the God; they likewiſe ſing hymns, and play on inſtruments made of horn, the drums beating at the ſame time.

Tho' the Bramins think the bare touch of a Soudra would pollute their pagods and images, they yet don't look upon publick proſtitutes as unworthy of dancing before the objects of their religious worſhip; nor do they ſuppoſe they are excluded the felicities of the next life, eſpecially if they keep conſtant to the man to whom they firſt made a ſacrifice of their chaſtity: for to ſay the truth, this kind of fornication is not more criminal than the marriages of thoſe people, ſince neither of them are ſanctified by the chriſtian religion.

Their Poranes relate, that Devendre aſſuming the ſhape of a man, went one day to viſit a curtezan, in order to try whether or no ſhe would be faithful to him. A bargain was ſtruck up between them, and he agreed to give her a handſome recompence, which was accordingly perform'd. She indulg'd him the utmoſt of his wiſhes on the night he had paid her ſo very generouſly, but did not ſleep a wink. Devendre feign'd himſelf ſick, and appear'd to his miſtreſs as tho' he had been really dead, whereupon ſhe the next day declar'd to her relations, that ſhe was reſolv'd to burn herſelf with the body of her lover, nor could all their prayers and intreaties diſſuade her from ſo ſo doing. Hereupon the funeral pile was prepar'd, and ſhe was going to follow him, when Devendre diſcover'd himſelf to be alive; and to reward her fidelity, promis'd her a place in the heaven where he preſides, and accordingly was as good as his word.

The worſhip of Images conſiſts in honouring them, and in dreſſing them up in ſuch ornaments as tradition aſſures are moſt agreeable to them. As for inſtance, Viſtnou delights in having his ſtatues deck'd with flowers, rich clothes, and precious ſtones; and the Viſtnouvas never fail to indulge him in his deſires. Eſwara has a different taſte, and delights in having his ſtatues waſh'd with eſſences, and his worſhippers are very careful to ſprinkle them with water in which pounded ſandal has been ſteep'd, or with other odoriferous waters. They teſtify the veneration they have for theſe idols, by lighting up lamps before them, and thoſe of their wives, and by preſenting victuals to them twice a-day. He who carries the diſh, having a little bell in his hand, is preceded by one who plays on the flute, and a drummer. After the rice has ſtood an hour before the idol, the above mention'd perſon comes and takes it back, then this meſs is conſider'd as a gift which is beſtow'd by the God on thoſe who eat of it.

The proceſſions of Viſtnou and Eſwara above-mention'd, are not only made monthly on the days appointed for that purpoſe, but have each a ſolemn feſtival every year, when they are carried with great pomp and ſolemnity into a tower as high as a houſe, which runs upon wheels, and is drawn by Maccoas, who are fiſhermen; a multitude of people of the four caſtes, crouding before and behind it. The idol being ſeated on the top of a chariot, is ſaluted by the ſpectators, who claſp their hands and liſt them up on high. There is alſo another proceſſion made at Paliacatte the afternoon of the tenth of January. The ſtatue on horſeback is carried out of the city, and when that of Viſtnou is carried in this manner into the country, ſeveral games are celebrated in his honour, ſuch as the letting looſe a he-goat or a fox, and endeavouring to kill them as they run, with ſticks which they hold in their left-hands. In the evening the God is brought back to the place of his reſidence, and the feſtival ends with a concert of muſick and the dances of young proſtitutes. The next day is Eſwara's turn, who is alſo carried into the country. The ſame ceremony is again perform'd the eleventh of June, but the day following he is only put on horſeback and carried on their ſhoulders.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Feſtivals of Viſtnou and Eſwara.

THE Bramins diſtinguiſh their feſtivals by three different names. Thoſe of Viſtnou and Eſwara are call'd Trenala; thoſe of the inferior divinities, ſuch as their wives and ſons, go by the name of Panduga; and Jataro thoſe of the Ganga; which we muſt obſerve not to confound with the river Ganges, tho' it be the ſame name.

The eighteenth of January, the married women celebrate the feſtival of Gauvri-Devi, which laſts nine days. Theſe days of devotion are inſtituted in honour of Parvati wife of Eſwara, to whom the Seyvias aſcribe a boundleſs power, which they expreſs by the word Mahaſecti, or great Power. They celebrate this feſtival in order to obtain a long life for their husbands, and to deprecate their ever being widows. They make an image of Parvati with rice meal, mix'd with red grain or corn; after which they clothe it, and adorn it with flowers; and having ſerv'd and attended on it for nine days, they carry it the tenth into a Palankin or ſedan out of the city, followed by a croud of married women; and at laſt, throw it into one of the ſacred ponds, and there leave it: which being done, they all return to their reſpective homes.

The 8*th* of February the Seyvias and Smaertas celebrate the feſtival of Tſeveratre; which is not obſerv'd by the Viſtnouvas. It conſiſts in faſting and watching a day and a night. The Soudras commonly ſpend all that night in gaming, to keep themſelves from falling aſleep, but are blam'd for ſo doing. This feſtival is celebrated in commemoration of Kalecote Viſsjam, that mortal poiſon from which Eſwara deliver'd the world, when they were in ſearch of the Amortam. He had no ſooner ſwallow'd this poiſon but he fainted away, when the Devetas ſeeing what had befallen him, commanded allmankind to faſt during that day, and to meditate continually on that deity, which gave him great eaſe. Being recover'd out of his ſwoon, he promis'd that all thoſe who ſhould celebrate this feſtival, ſhould obtain a full remiſſion of all his ſins.

The 14*th* after the new moon of Auguſt, the Bramins and Soudras of both ſexes, celebrate the feſtival call'd Ananta Padmanaba Uratam. This feaſt is ſolemniz'd in order to obtain health in this life, and heaven in that to come. They endeavour to perform this religious act on the bank of ſome river whoſe waters are ſweet, otherwiſe 'tis celebrated in ſome houſe or pagod. The Bramins, who only are allow'd the privilege of officiating at it, take a handful of long ſtraws, and make them up into fourteen knots. 'Tis then the image of Ananta Padmanaba, which is incenſed, deck'd with flowers, and conjur'd with a kind of exorciſm. After this, a red girdle with fourteen knots in it, is tied about the right-arm of that perſon who obliges himſelf to obſerve this feaſt, and this girdle goes generally four times round the arm. When a Soudra is initiated into this myſtery, he goes up to a Bramin who ties the Dſandhem about his arm; which being done, a little pot with water in it is put in his name, and under it ſome Nili is ſown, and the whole is cover'd with a linnen cloth on which a flower is painted, and natural ones ſtrew'd up and down it. The Bramin has a Danan or alms for his trouble, which is made him either in fruits, in rice, or in money.

This feſtival is celebrated annually, and he who has ſolemniz'd it once, is oblig'd to repeat it fourteen times, after which he is at liberty either to continue it, or give an entertainment to the Bramins. If he once begins again, he is oblig'd to repeat it for another fourteen years. Such as have accompliſh'd the fourteen years, have the privilege of having a golden girdle made inſtead of a red one.

The inſtitution of this feſtival is aſcrib'd to certain ſaints, and to excite the devotion of the people the following ſtory is related. The wife of a rich Bramin who was wholly ignorant of this ceremony, going to waſh herſelf in a river whoſe waters were [a] ſweet, was ſurpriz'd to meet with perſons who were ſolemnizing this feſtival. After having been inform'd of the reaſon thereof, the girdle was tied about her arm, and ſhe return'd home with it. Her husband ſeeing it on, and being told how ſhe had come by it, he took it from her arm and threw it into the fire; but he was puniſh'd for ſo doing by loſing all his poſſeſſions in an inſtant. This great loſs affected him very ſenſibly, whereupon he ſet out in ſearch of the God in whoſe honour this feſtival was celebrated, and not being able to find him, ſunk down thro' wearineſs. However the Deity appear'd to him under the ſhape of an old Bramin, and ask'd him what was the matter with him. The ruin'd Bramin began to tell him all his ſtory, but the old man interrupted him, ſaying, Art thou ſuch a madman to go in ſearch of God? Doſt thou think thou ſhalt ever be able to find him? Thou hadſt better return home, enjoy thy eaſe, and not fatigue thy ſelf in this manner. I will not give over the ſearch, reply'd the other, but will either find him or die. Theſe words melted the God to compaſſion, ſo that he was no longer able to act under this feigned character, but revealing himſelf, comforted him and reſtor'd him to his ſtrength. The Bramin was not wanting in his acknowledgments, for having the gift of poeſy, and being skilful in making extempore verſes, he ſtruck out ſome that inſtant, and the God was ſo pleas'd with them, that he promis'd him him he ſhould, at his return, find all the poſſeſſions in his houſe which he had before been maſter of, and that he ſhould one day go to heaven; all which happen'd accordingly.

The Bramins have a particular feſtival call'd Traſvanala Pondema, every full moon in Auguſt. On this day the Dſandhem is given to children who are hereby Bramaſariis, and at the ſame time the Graſaſtas or married Bramins take a new one.

The 8th after the full moon of the ſame month, the Bramins and Soudras celebrate the nativity of Viſtnou by the name of Kriſtna. Here follows the origin of that feſtival which is call'd Gokoulaſtemi.

In the age Duaparagom, or the third age of the world, Kampſa, who was a powerful Settrea, had a ſiſter, Deveki by name, whom he gave in marriage to Vaſſoudeva of the ſame Caſte. While they were making merry at the wedding, an Akaſavani, or fluttering ſpirit, came and interrupted the feſtivity, and ſaid to Kampſa; Why art thou thus gay and jovial? theſe nuptials will be fatal to thee, for the eighth child thy ſiſter ſhall bring forth will be thy deſtruction. At theſe words, Kampſa put a ſtop to the mirth and rejoicings, and would have kill'd his ſiſter. He was prevented, and afterwards contented himſelf with confining her and her husband, upon condition that ſhe ſhould deliver up all her children into his hands. He aſſign'd them a habitation or rather priſon, and ſhut them up therein, together with an aſs who bray'd every time ſhe was deliver'd of a child, when Kampſa ruſhing in at the ſignal, took the babe and threw it from the top of the houſe to the bottom. He had already deſtroy'd ſeven in this manner, and was preparing the ſame fate for the eighth, but miſs'd his aim. By the city they were in there run a river, on the other ſide of which was another pretty large city named Gocalam, inhabited by herdſmen, whoſe chief, call'd Nanda, had a wife, Hiſſohoda by name, who kept a great many cows, by which ſhe got her livelihood. This chief of the herdſmen and his wife, in the other life before that they then led, had made a vow to Viſtnou, who reveal'd himſelf to them under the ſhape of a moſt beautiful boy, and ask'd what they requeſted of him. They were fill'd with ſo much admiration, that without once reflecting on what they had before deſir'd, they pray'd to have a ſon like to the child that ſtood before them. Viſtnou promis'd to indulge them their wiſh in the next life, and the time of his fulfilling his promiſe was now come, when Kampſa's ſiſter was deliver'd of her eighth child, which happen'd to be a ſon, who was born with four hands, and was called Kriſtna; and 'tis thus, ſay the Bramins, that Viſtnou beſtows in heaven the pleaſures call'd Lila-Veicontam: they add, that he reſides in the Veicontam, where he is a pure ſpirit without any corporeal form. The child's parents were ſurpriz'd at his birth, they diſcovering ſomething divine in it, and therefore had recourſe to prayer; but how much was their aſtoniſhment increas'd, when they heard it ſpeak in this manner: You are now going to be freed from your captivity; however take care not to diſcover my birth, but carry me to Gocalam on the other ſide of the river, to the houſe of Nanda whoſe wife is juſt now deliver'd of a daughter; there leave me, and put this little girl in my ſtead, when the aſs will bray. The guards did not ſee Kriſtna's father and mother when they went out; the gates flew open at the bare touch of his foot, and the river having divided its waters, they croſſed it as on dry land, when they went to Nada, and there made the exchange unobſerv'd. This being done, they return'd to their confinement, and Deveki laying herſelf down in bed with the little girl by her ſide, the aſs immediately began to bray. Kempſa comes in a little after, fully reſolv'd to ſacrifice this eighth ſon to his jealouſy, whereupon his ſiſter beſought him to ſpare her, ſince ſhe was a girl; but he being inflexible, threw the child aloft in order to catch it upon the point of his ſword, but the babe was ſuſpended in the air, and ſaid to him, Thou ſhalt not kill me, thy enemy is at Gocalam, and he will take vengeance of thee. Kampſa was going to vent his fury on his ſiſter and his brother-in-law, but his friends adviſed him rather to wreck it upon the child who gave him thoſe fatal alarms: he took their advice, and accordingly they went in purſuit of them, but Kriſtna kill'd them all in ſport. Being grown up, he went to Madura, where he kill'd his uncle, deliver'd his father and mother, and perform'd a great many other aſtoniſhing exploits. 'Tis to be obſerv'd, that he was born at midnight, when the Devetas and ſome ſaints having notice of it, they faſted all the day following; and as that night was not a fit ſeaſon for ſolemnizing any feſtival, they put it off to the next day, and faſted till the morrow, when they began to make merry. The Bramins, in commemoration of Kriſtna's birth, dreſs themſelves in their fineſt clothes, treat one another, ſend mutually Taier or milk taken off with the cream, coco nuts, and ſuch refreſhments, as are uſually met with in herdſmens cottages. On this day, the ſtreets of all the cities and towns are adorn'd with greens and hung with leaves.

The 1*ſt* of the new moon of September, the wives of the Bramins celebrate among themſelves the feſtival of Maherna Houmi; it continues nine days, and was inſtituted in honour of Latſemi, in order to obtain their husbands riches and a long life. They mutually invite one another, and on the ninth day, the Bramins celebrate the ſame feſtival in their turn in honour of Viſtnou, and in gratitude to their wives, they implore of him all ſuch things as may contribute to their ſatisfaction.

The Soudras imitate the Bramins in this cuſtom; they invite each other reciprocally, kill he-goats and perform ſacrifices. On this day the ſoldiers ſcower their arms, which for that reaſon is call'd the feſtival of arms. They are unanimouſly of opinion, that the day after is a perfectly propitious one, and that they have no occaſion to ſelect any particular hours in it.

A week after the new moon of October, is the feſtival of Dipavali, which is celebrated in manner following. Before ſun-riſe, they waſh their heads, put on their fineſt clothes, invite their friends to their houſes, and the night following illuminate their houſes and the pagods, and the children go up and down the ſtreets with lighted candles: which feſtival is inſtituted in honour of Viſtnou. We are told on this occaſion, that While he reſided upon the earth under the name of Kriſtna, a Ratjasja, Nara-Kaſora by name, who was living at that time, had ſeiz'd on the whole world, and particularly on ſixteen thouſand virgins, whom he kept priſoners. Kriſtna having compaſſion on them, overcame the raviſher, kill'd him, went into his houſe, and reſtor'd the maidens to their liberty; who being ſtruck with his beauty, wiſh'd each of them in ſecret to have him for her husband. Kriſtna, who knew their deſires, fulfill'd them. As the Ratjasja was dead only to live again, he was not angry at his having got him ſo great a number of miſtreſſes, ſince he ſet a crown upon his head, and order'd him to conduct himſelf with prudence for the future. When Kriſtna left this world, he commanded them to celebrate a feſtival in his honour, and promis'd that whoever ſhould aſſiſt at it, ſhould have a full remiſſion of all his ſins and be very happy in this life. The Malabarians have likewiſe a feſtival in July, call'd Adi Panduga, and another in November, call'd Cartica Panduga; the motives of the inſtitution whereof we are not well acquainted. Beſides the feaſts above-mentioned, they have certain days which are look'd upon as holy; and they believe, that an alms beſtow'd on thoſe days to a ſingle perſon, is as meritorious as a thouſand times as much given to a thouſand perſons at another ſeaſon.

CHAP. X.

Of Pongol, or the Feast of the Sun, and of the Worship of the other Devetas.

THE beauty of the sun, and his great usefulness to the universe by the light he diffuses, and the prolific heat with which he animates all nature, were some of the first causes of idolatry. The Bramins have not only given his name to that day which we call Sunday, and by them call'd Suria-vanam, but also celebrate a festival in his honour, call'd Pongol, which falls out on the 9th of January. The Bramins of the first caste, look upon this day only as a happy and propitious one, but the Soudras make a festival of it. They visit one another, make mutual presents, and their most considerable persons are visited by the Bramins. They boil rice in milk; and if they have not milk enough, they mix water with it. At other times, they throw away the water in which the rice has been boil'd, but on this day they keep it on the fire till all the water is evaporated. They boil the rice without the house, in some place which lies open to the sun, and place it in such a manner that it may receive its meridian rays. When they perceive that he withdraws himself, they cry Pongol, and repeat it four times. The rice which is thus boil'd on this day, is look'd upon as very holy, and is kept as long as possible. Some of these people renew this festival every Sunday. One of the reasons of the institution of this feast, is from a notion they entertain, that Ratjasja Belli, of whom mention will be made in the sequel, descends that day upon the earth in order to survey the state of things. 'Tis pretended, that when this Ratjasja was banish'd to Patalam, or the abyss, after having been conquer'd by Vistnou, he obtain'd leave to come once a year upon earth.

But mankind are not the only Beings who rejoice at this festival, but their cows, buffles, or wild oxen, partake in it. The day after the Pongol, in the midst of their mirth and jollity, and when Vistnou is carried into the country, the beasts above-mention'd are also led thither early in the morning, their necks being adorn'd with crowns and cakes. I took notice when I mention'd the daily exercise of the Bramins, of what was perform'd every morning and every evening in honour of the sun. This Deveta has a little pagod, in which his idol is honour'd by lighting up a lamp before it, when they lift up their hands before it, and pay it divine honours.

Altho' Garrouda, Annemonta, Vicgneswara, and Virrepadra, are not Deities, they yet are honour'd, and are consider'd as the dispensers of health, and the rest of the blessings of life. Prayers are likewise made, and offerings presented to them. Vicgneswara has the greatest attendance, being generally worshipp'd and serv'd in private houses as a kind of tutelary Divinity. But they have not the same affection for Virrepadra, tho' he also is one of Eswara's sons. His birth, which is the effect of the anger of that God, and the weapons with which they represent him arm'd, are very inconsistent with the genius of so pacific a nation. The women address themselves to Vicgneswara in order to obtain children, and for that purpose offer her rice, cocoa nuts, and flowers.

Nor is Devendre or his subalterns without these honours, but are also worshipped, and have sacrifices offer'd up to them. The Jagam is made in honour of Devendre, by which the petitioners implore, to be carried up into that heaven where he presides. They invoke Achni, in order to enjoy a good reputation in the world; Varouna, for water; Vajouvia, for strength and vigour; and Isania, for a great credit and authority. They don't consider them as the authors, but the dispensers of these temporal blessings; and add, that mankind must raise their thoughts higher.

A very ſurprizing circumſtance, is, that Brahma, who is look'd upon as the creator and univerſal governour of the world, ſhould not have any peculiar worſhip eſtabliſh'd in a nation, who ſo far from confining their tenderneſs to thoſe to whom they fancy themſelves indebted for any benefit, but extend it even to ſuch as have the leaſt relation to them. As for inſtance, they have all red ſparrow-hawks in the utmoſt veneration for Garrouda's ſake; and cows and oxen are very much rever'd upon account of Baſwa; but as for Brahma, he has not ſo much as one pagod, or a ſingle ſtatue erected in his honour.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Worſhip of Ganga Gramma, of Gournata and the other Ratjasjas.

THESE idolaters do not only honour all happy and beneficent deities, but have alſo inſtituted ſeveral religious ceremonies, in order to procure the favour of thoſe whom they conſider as the inſtruments of divine vengeance: of theſe there are a very great number, among which Ganga and Gournata are the moſt famous.

The name of Ganga is common to the river Ganges, which, for diſtinction ſake, is called Ganga Nadi; and to a devil, Ganga Gramma by name, whom the Bramins declare to be of the female ſex. Some will have it, that ſhe's one of Eſwara's wives, while others aſſert that ſhe is not married. Be that as it will, Ganga Gramma is repreſented with one head and four arms; ſhe holds in her left hand a little bowl, and in her right, a trident. There are few places but we meet with pagods erected in her honour; whereas Gournata, who is thought to have a more extenſive power than Ganga, and is by the Seyvias's look'd upon as one of the ſons, and the moſt faithful ſervants of Eſwara, has not ſo much as one pagod dedicated to him, and only a few ſtatues placed in the fields. We often meet with the ſtatue of the latter ſurrounded with Ratjasjas, made of brick, ſtanding round him like his council. The people go and worſhip him under a tree, and perſuade one another that they have ſeen him perſonally.

In India there are ſome feſtivals inſtituted in honour of Ganga, on certain ſtated days, at Paliacatte excepted, and perhaps, certain other cities, whoſe governours appoint the days of their ſolemnization. This feaſt, which is alſo call'd Pongol, differs from that dedicated to the ſun: rice is alſo boil'd at this ſolemnity, either in the pagod, or at a little diſtance from it, but the Bramins never celebrate this feaſt.

In the morning the rice is boil'd, and in the afternoon the idol of Ganga, being ſeated on a chariot, is carried up and down before the image of Viſtnou. A great number of he-goats is ſacrificed in his honour, and their heads are cut off by the men who ſerve in the pagod, with a knife made purpoſely for that ceremony. A machine is carried in theſe proceſſions, like thoſe engines, which are uſed for drawing of water out of wells. All ſuch perſons who, in a fit of ſickneſs, or any imminent danger, have made a vow to Ganga, receive a voluntary kind of ſtrapado at that time. Two hooks are fix'd in the skin of their backs, and with theſe they are lifted up into the air, where they act a great many apiſh tricks, ſuch as ſhooting off a gun and charging it again, or brandiſhing ſwords. Women very often offer to perform theſe feats, deluded and impos'd upon by thoſe who aſſure it puts them to no manner of pain. And to prevent the people from being undeceiv'd by the cries of thoſe who are hook'd together in this manner, they all ſhout aloud at that very inſtant.

Some ſuffer a pack-thread to be run into their fleſh, which they draw while they are dancing, and theſe deluded wretches undergo this grievous operation purely to pleaſe Ganga.

We are aſſur'd, that in certain places ſome perſons are ſo infatuated with zeal, as to fall proſtrate before the chariot of Ganga purpoſely to be run over, and that ſeveral of theſe are cruſh'd to pieces upon the ſpot.

Night being come, they ſacrifice a buffle, of whom they ask a great many queſtions, and conſult the idol on each of them; which being done, they cut its head off with a knife made purpoſely for that uſe, and bury the body in the ſtreet before the pagod. They let his blood run into a pot, which being preſented before the idol, they pretend, that not a drop of it is found in it the next day. Antiently it was uſual to ſacrifice a [a] man to Ganga, but ſome perſon had credit enough to engage him to be ſatisfied with a buffle. When a mortality rages at any time among the cattle, he-goats are immediately ſacrific'd. The ſame is done when a ſhip is launch'd, at beginning any new work, ſuch as the making a ditch, a hut, &c. Whatever they undertake, they do their utmoſt to obtain the favour of Ganga and Gournata.

The Bramins of the firſt Caſte condemn theſe ſacrifices, which are very common among thoſe of the fourth; however they dare not oppoſe them. They hold, that ſuch as have obſerv'd this cuſtom, die, and are born again ſeveral times; that they muſt expiate theſe ſacrifices by a multitude of miſeries, which they are oblig'd to ſuffer in this world, after which they go into hell, out of which God delivers them after an unlimited time.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Human Soul; its Origin and State after death.

MANKIND, according to the Bramins, were created by Brahma, who having received the power of creating the ſeveral worlds, gave being to nine men, who, with the children which he had by his wife Saraſwati, peopled the earth.

They make no diſtinction between the ſoul of man and that of brutes; but ſay, that its whole dignity conſiſts, in that man has a body in which the ſoul is at greater liberty to diſplay itſelf, and perform ſuch operations as are more worthy of its nature. According to this doctrine, the ſpirit of man is not ſuperior to that of beaſts, but only in the different conſtruction of the organs which they animate; and that the beaſts would be able to reaſon and expreſs their thoughts, were their bodies capable of co-operating to the functions of the ſoul, which is, as it were, chain'd down to this earthly tabernacle. To prove their aſſertions, they alledge the imbecility of childhood, and the weakneſs and crazineſs of old age. The ſoul, ſay they, is ſtill the ſame, but when the organs are not as yet form'd, 'tis impoſſible for it to exhibit the ſame thoughts outwardly, 'till ſuch time as thoſe very organs have attain'd their due perfection; and in the ſame manner, when age makes any alteration in them, the ſoul falls into its former impotency.

The

[a] 'Tis ſurprizing that this nation, which does not offer any bloody victim either to Viſtnou or Eſwara, altho' they look upon him as the ſupreme God, ſhould yet ſhed the blood of animals before Ganga. This is alſo a relick of the antient ſuperſtition of the Egyptians, which the learned among the Greeks had adopted in their writings. Porphyry, who would not allow the offering of living animals to the ſupreme Being, thought the worſhip of evil ſpirits neceſſary, in order to divert their pernicious influences from corn, fruits, fields and cities. Plato would have animals ſacrific'd, and their blood offer'd to the ſpirits of the air. The Manicheans, who divided the government of the univerſe into two principles, the one good, the other bad, came originally from the eaſt, and is no more than a refinement on that antient error.

The Bramins are not agreed with regard to the origin of ſouls. Some aſſert, that they began to exiſt by the bare will of God, before the univerſe was created; that they reſided in the divine eſſence; and that after the creation, they were lodg'd in the bodies of men or thoſe of beaſts, in order to expiate the ſins they had committed. Others aſſure, that the ſoul is eternal, that it has ever exiſted in God, and explain their doctrine by the following compariſon. In like manner, ſay they, as all rivers empty themſelves into the ſea, and compoſe one whole therewith, juſt ſo ſouls come from God, and re-unite with his eſſence. They employ the ſame arguments with Plato to prove the eternity of the ſoul. A people who believe the ſoul to be eternal, are far from diſputing its being immortal.

They allow of rewards and puniſhments after this life, but ſay, that the wicked are not all puniſhed alike. Some will be puniſhed in this world after death, and others in that to come.

If ſuch a ſoul as the above-mention'd, may, for the ſins it has committed, be impriſon'd as it were in a body, it may alſo, from the ſame reaſon, be diſlodged from it, to be in a worſe condition, whether in the body of a man or that of a brute. This doctrine of the tranſmigration of ſouls was not peculiar to the Egyptians; for the Druids, according to Cæſar, had the ſame notion. [a] Ovid and [b] Tibullus among the Romans have written agreeable to that doctrine; the [c] Germans had alſo imbib'd the ſame notion, and the [d] Getes had receiv'd it from Zamolxis. Plato approved it, and Plotinus his diſciple, but Porphyry receiv'd it with certain reſtrictions; for he allow'd that ſouls tranſmigrate from one human body into another, but thought it beneath the dignity of man, for a human ſoul to paſs into that of a brute. He found too much abſurdity in a ſyſtem, according to which, it might ſcandalouſly have happen'd, that when the ſoul of a woman had tranſmigrated into the body of a mule, her ſon might mount her ignorantly, and claſp her ſides with his hooſs. But the Bramins, who are leſs ſcrupulous, admit the whole ſyſtem without the leaſt reſtriction. Theſe don't meet with any remora in their way, which ſhould prevent their believing, that the ſame ſoul may reſide ſucceſſively in the body of a man, of a beaſt, or that of a plant.

The moſt honourable tranſmigration, next to that of the human body, is into the body of an ox or cow. Beſides the reaſons already brought with regard to the preference which is given to that animal, I ſhall add further, that 'tis a relick of the worſhip which the antient Egyptians paid their God Apis; and that Baſwa, or the ox, which is the Bahaman or vehicle of Eſwara, had probably no other origin. Mr. Roger tells us, that an ox dedicated to a pagod, happening to die a natural death, his obſequies were perform'd in as honourable a manner as if he had been a perſon of diſtinction.

I have already obſerved, that ſome ſouls, at their quitting the body, don't immediately tranſmigrate into another, but become Ratjasjas becauſe of their ſins; and that to expiate them, they flutter for ſome time in the air; that they labour under extreme want, and are not able to enjoy any thing that is given them by way of alms. Their power is ſo ſmall, that 'tis not dreaded in the leaſt, notwithſtanding the firm perſuaſion which prevails of thoſe Ratjasjas's often aſſuming a human ſhape. Their puniſhment is not ſo great as that of thoſe ſouls who go and expiate their ſins in the hell where Jamma preſides.

The laſt are of two ſorts. The firſt continue there but a limited, tho' very long time, and after having been ſufficiently purg'd by their ſufferings, return back upon the earth, and are there cloath'd with new bodies. The ſecond are hurl'd into Antam-Tappes, or the dark well, whence they can never return. They there ſuffer infinite torments, both with regard to the violence of them, and their duration; and among other other tortures, are torn with thorns, with mad crows with ſteel beaks, and by dogs and gnats who are continually ſtinging them. Beſides the exceſſive cold which prevails in that well, it abounds with every kind of torture which can poſſibly heighten the rigour of their puniſhment.

As the law-givers among the Bramins have appointed puniſhments for the wicked, they have alſo prompted men to the practice of virtue, by the hopes of enjoying the utmoſt felicity in the life to come. Here follows what they promiſe the virtuous. They allot them ſeven different places under heaven, where Indre or Devendre, Achni, Niruti, Vajouvia, Cubera, Iſangia, and Varouna preſide. 'Tis there that ſuch ſouls as are deſtin'd to return again upon the earth, go and enjoy that felicity which is the reward of virtue. Such as have led ſtill more perfect lives, are rais'd to the heaven of Brah aa, but both are to return again upon earth; however with this difference, that when the laſt have liv'd their appointed period here below, they infallibly go into heaven, and there continue to all eternity.

Surgam is the general name they give to the ſeven inferior heavens, and all the ſouls which go thither are real Devetas's; but after they have enjoy'd all the pleaſures that are to be found in them, not excepting thoſe of the ſenſes, the moment their deſtin'd time is come, they are oblig'd to abandon thoſe delights, and tranſmigrate into another body, when they leave that with which they were clothed in paradiſe. The Bramins cannot tell what becomes of that body which has adminiſtred to their happineſs; it poſſibly may ſerve to lodge ſome ſoul that is newly arriv'd. However ſome Devetas always live in Surgam, ſuch as the ſun, the moon, the ſtars, and ſeveral others. It is impoſſible for the ſouls who are in Surgam to ſin any more, becauſe God reveals himſelf ſometimes there, and inſtructs them.

Veicontam is allotted to thoſe who are reſerv'd to a ſtate of greater felicity. There are two places which go by this name; the firſt is call'd Veicontam, where God himſelf reſides; the ſecond is Lila-Veicontam, or the Heaven of Pleaſures. The Bramins are not agreed whether the ſouls admitted into the latter are to return again upon earth; but they are unanimouſly of opinion, that whoever is receiv'd into the former, enjoys an eternity of bliſs in it. After all, ſay they, very few lead ſo virtuous a life as to be entitled to the enjoyment of ſo ſupreme a felicity. But 'tis not ſo difficult nor rare to be admitted into Surgam.

CHAP. XIII.

Of good Works and Religious Auſterities.

A Life to come, in which mankind are to be either rewarded or puniſh'd, according as their actions have been good or bad, implies the neceſſity of good works. A Bramin was for falling proſtrate before the Devetas, but calling to mind that theſe deities humble themſelves before Brahma, he thought it more proper to pay his reſpects to him. However, he again changed his reſolution; when he recollected that Brahma is oblig'd to render to every one according to his works, and concluded that he ought to rely wholly on the merits of his own works.

The Bramins think that rewards and puniſhments are not diſtributed in this life; as man, in their opinion, has a variety of births, they believe that divine juſtice is exercis'd only in the life to come. Thus every man who ſuffers, expiates the ſins he had committed in the preceding life, and before he aſſumes the body which is puniſh'd. As very few have ſo good an opinion of their purity, as to imagine it will abſolutely entitle them to a place either in Veicontam, or in Surgam, moſt of them rely entirely on on the merits of certain exerciſes, which convey a forgiveneſs of ſins along with them. Beſides thoſe auſterities which are expreſſly enjoin'd by the Vedam, there are others which are exercis'd out of pure whim by certain devotees, who aſpire at a greater perfection than other people. Mr. Roget's ſaw an inſtance of this mortification in the little pagod of Parvati, near that of Eſwara, which, according to the account he has given of it, exceeds all the auſterities that were ever practis'd by any religious order.

This Bramin abſtain'd from whatever is uſually eaten, and fed only on a little ſweet milk, and a little fruit. He continued ſitting all the day long without once ſtirring from his place, and never laid down to ſleep, but keeping himſelf in a very uneaſy poſture, endeavour'd to refrain from ſleep as long as poſſible, repeating inceſſantly the thouſand names of Eſwara. He had the idol repreſenting that deity, which he adorn'd with flowers; lighted up a lamp before it, and incenſed it. He had no ſooner finiſh'd this exerciſe, but riſing up, he ſet his head in the place where his heels ſhould be, and in this poſture repeated ſeveral pretty long prayers; which being done, he went and ſat down in the ſame place where he had ſtood before, and began again the ſame exerciſe. This being ended, he went into the green on which the pagod ſtood, where ſtood two bamboos rais'd like poles, in the ſhape of a gibbet, at the top of which two ropes were fix'd with a ſlip-knot. Underneath was a ſquare pit, where he lighted a fire, and laid ſome ſticks near it. After this he turn'd himſelf thrice round the fire, obſerving, by way of reſpect, to have the pit always at his right; then proſtrating himſelf ſeveral times, he went up, twiſted the ropes about his feet, then [a] ſuſpending himſelf with his head downwards, and his face turn'd towards the flame, he ſwung himſelf up and down like a bell, and increas'd the fire by throwing wood into it which was in his reach. After this painful exerciſe, which laſted half an hour, he came down, went round the pit, and returning into the pagod ſeated himſelf as before. In this manner did this Bramin exerciſe himſelf daily, not in the view of obtaining heaven, for that he look'd upon as granted, but in order to attain a pure exalted degree of felicity. However he was cenſur'd by the reſt of the Bramins, for violating, as they ſaid, the law, in not having made choice of ſuch a holy place as the Joguis are permitted to ſpend their whole lives in.

Another Bramin had his head thruſt through an iron collar of twenty-four pound weight, made like a rail, four foot in diameter at top. He had enjoin'd himſelf to carry it till ſuch time as he had collected a great ſum of money, in order for the building an hoſpital.

Two others had [b] long heavy chains upon their legs, one end of which came over their ſhoulders, and the other trail'd upon the ground after them.

Another had got himſelf chain'd by the foot to a tree, with a firm reſolution of dying in that place.

Another walk'd in wooden ſhoes ſtuck full of nails in the inſide; whenever he put them on, he uſed to lie along the ground with his hands claſp'd: 'tis ſurprizing how this man could be able to walk with theſe ſhoes.

CHAP. XIV.

Of ſuch Places as are holy, and the Forgiveneſs of Sins.

MAN is not indued with juſtice ſufficient for approaching God; and by ſin is excluded eternal life. 'Tis the buſineſs of religion to furniſh expedients for the remiſſion of ſins. That of the Bramins teaches ſeveral methods of purification. The firſt

[a] See the figure in which this penitent and the three following are repreſented.

[b] St. Epiphany relates, that in his time the prieſts of Saturn in Egypt uſed to load themſelves with irons, and run rings through their noſtrils; that they wore long hair, very dirty clothes, &c. The deſcription he gives of them anſwers pretty nearly to that of the Joguis Indians. See Epiph. lib. 3. contra Hæreſ. 344, and following.

firſt is to viſit thoſe places which are famous for their holineſs, ſuch as Ajot-ja, Matura, Caſi, Canje, Aventa-Capouri and Duareveti, which, according to the Bramins, are the ſeven moſt holy places upon earth. All ſuch men and beaſts as die at Caſi aſcend ſtrait up to heaven, but thoſe who expire in the ſix others, go to that place where Brahma reſides, whence they are to return again upon the earth. But this is their laſt ſtage or life, after which they go up into heaven and there continue to all eternity. All theſe holy places are not of equal extent, and the promiſes which are made to ſuch as die in them, are confin'd to themſelves only. Caſi includes a [a]quarter of a league in diameter, and that of Ajot-ja, twelve.

Ajot-ja lies northward about twelve leagues from Caſi; it is holy, becauſe Viſtnou, under the name of Ramma, was born in it.

Matura, not far from Agra, which is the reſidence of the Great Mogul; Viſtnou was born there under the name of Kriſtna.

Caſi, call'd alſo Varanaſi, is in the kingdom of Bengal, on the banks of the Ganges, twelve leagues from Ajot-ja and Preyaga. Caſi is thought to be ſo holy a place, that all who die in it enjoy the privilege which Eſwara formerly honour'd it with. When any perſon there is juſt going to expire, he never fails to come and blow in his right ear, and by that means purify him from all his ſins; for which reaſon, not only men, but even beaſts, when they die, always lay themſelves down with their left ear turn'd to the ground. Should any one, ſay they, be ſo imprudent as to lay his right ear downwards, he would certainly turn about, juſt when he is going to yield up the ghoſt. This they confirm by a ſtory of a native of Mogul, who doubting the truth of this miracle, was reſolv'd to ſee an experiment of it. He had a horſe that was quite ſpent and juſt ready to die, when he order'd his four legs to be ty'd, and had him laid on his right ſide, which was accordingly done; but no ſooner was he juſt yielding up his laſt gaſp, but the ropes with which he was ty'd broke of themſelves, and he turn'd about upon his left ſide. As the ſouls of thoſe who die at Caſi are not to return any more upon the earth, their bodies become petrified.

Canje or Canjeſwaram, a large and famous city of the kingdom of Carnate, has a great number of pagods.

Avente-Capouri or Aventeutica, a city ſituated to the north of Agra, is rever'd for the holy places which are in it.

Duaraca or Duareveti, near Surat, was antiently a holy place, but the ſea has quite ſwallow'd it up. Kriſtna died there, and was, according to the uſual cuſtom, to have been burnt in it, but the ſea wafted him from thence to Siangernata or Prouſotamai, at the extremity of the gulf of Bengal, upon which account this laſt place is thought to be very holy. If a vulgar tradition is to be credited, the bodies of all ſuch as die there grow as hard as wood. Every thing is pure in this place, in any other a Bramin wou'd not dare to touch a Soudra, nor eat of any thing he had touch'd; but here he may venture to take it from him, and if he were to ſay, this is unclean, worms would immediately iſſue out of his mouth.

Prajaga lies twelve leagues diſtant from Caſi in going up the Ganges, and is nearer the city of Agra. Here three arms of the Ganges meet, or rather, two other rivers empty themſelves into it. This water has the property of waſhing away ſin; and ſuicide, which in all other places is a crime, is not ſo in this.

Too great a number of people would be depriv'd of the advantages which accrue from the holineſs of theſe places, were they indulg'd only to ſuch as have an opportunity of going to them. But to render their efficacy more univerſal, it has been eſtabliſh'd, that whoever ſhall repeat their names, and direct his thoughts to them, will reap as much benefit as if he were to viſit them in perſon; for which reaſon, all who ſet ſet themſelves up for devotees, repeat them over very carefully every morning, as if they were ſo many prayers.

[a] By this word leagues, we are to underſtand thoſe of the country that are called Coſſes, and which are near 2500 geometrical paces in length; I ſay near, for there are ſome leagues that are not above 2400.

All ſuch as ſolemnize the appointed feſtivals, have likewiſe their ſins pardon'd, whereof I have already given ſome inſtances in the foregoing chapter.

The Bramins alſo make a mighty merit of ablutions, for which they employ either freſh or ſalt water. The latter has the property of cleanſing from ſin, only with regard to the diſtinctions of times and places; for being itſelf impure, 'tis conſequently incapable of producing this effect. The antient Egyptians hated the ſea as much, and look'd upon all iſlanders as unclean. The abovemention'd [a] Egyptians fancied the ſea was form'd from Saturn's tears; nor do the Bramins aſcribe a more natural origin to it. Here follows what they tell us on that head.

Agaſtea[b] who was a very holy but very little man, and no bigger than one's thumb; who exiſted from the beginning of the world, and will continue to the end of it, was walking near the ſea. This element laughing at the littleneſs of his ſtature, he reſented it, and ſwelling with rage, he drew the whole ocean into his hand as tho' it had been a ſingle drop of water, and ſwallow'd it all down. The Devetas were extremely uneaſy at what had happen'd, and telling him how much they ſhould ſuffer for want of this neceſſary element, they conjur'd him to throw it up: Agaſtea, unable to reſiſt their prayers, evacuated it all like ſo much urine, which occaſion'd its ſaltneſs. The ſea is pure the firſt day of every month, and during eclipſes, and the conjunctions of certain ſtars; and in all ſeaſons, in that part of it which is oppoſite to the pagod Rameſwara, call'd by the Malabarians Ramanatacovil, whither the people flock in crouds to cleanſe and purify themſelves.

Among the ſeveral rivers of freſh water, the Indians aſcribe a very great holineſs to the Ganges. Its virtue is ſo great, that it has an effect even on all ſuch as barely waſh themſelves in it, without any deſign of thereby obtaining the remiſſion of their ſins. The inhabitants of Bengal repoſe ſo much confidence in it, that ſuch of them as live on the banks of that river, never fail to carry their ſick to it when they are juſt ready to give up the ghoſt, and plunge them into the water as high as the waiſt. But as this bleſſing would extend to a few perſons only, and that all who live at a great diſtance from it may enjoy its efficacy, 'tis univerſally agreed, that whatever waters a man may waſh himſelf with, they all will have the ſame property, provided that while he is uſing them, he thinks on thoſe of the Ganges, and ſays Ganga ſianam, or O Ganges waſh me. But this is not all, this water is put in bottles and carry'd up into the country, in the ſame manner as thoſe of Pyrmont and other mineral waters in Paris, &c.

CHAP. XV.

The mythological Origin of the Ganges. The Hiſtory of Belli, of Sagara and Bagireta.

THE river Ganges does not ſpring, as others do, out of the bowels of the earth, but came originally from heaven into that of Devendre, and from thence into Indoſtan.

Belli, the Ratjasja, having made a vow to Eſwara, and obtain'd from him the power of overcoming all his enemies, was ſo puffed up with this privilege, that he had the inſolence to attack Devendre and the Chiefs of the other worlds, which are under heaven: of theſe he poſſeſs'd himſelf, and drove them out of the places where they preſide.

[a] Voſſius de Idol. lib. ii. cap: 75.

[b] As we know not the ſignification of this word in the Samſcortam language, from whence it is borrow'd, 'tis difficult to determine whether it be a proper or a common name.

preſide. Hereupon they complain'd of it to Brahma, and he related the whole to Viſtnou. This God, who had ſome friendſhip for Belli, becauſe of the great ſervice he did him, thought proper to employ artifice rather than ſtrength, and for that purpoſe came into the world under the name of Vamana a young Bramin; and one day as Belli was offering a Jagam or ſacrifice, he took that opportunity of begging a favour of him. What doſt thou require of me, ſays Belli? Make me a preſent of three foot of earth, replied the young Bramin: which he accordingly did; whereupon he began immediately to meaſure the earth. He ſtamp'd upon it with one of his feet, and drove it down as low as Patalam, or the abyſs, when he touch'd the egg-ſhell with which all the worlds are ſurrounded; then lifted up his other foot acroſs all the other worlds, and ſet it on the oppoſite ſide of the ſame ſhell. He afterwards ask'd where he ſhou'd place his third foot, (for the Poranes or chronicles beſtow arms and feet very liberally.) Set it on my head, replied Belli. Vamana took him at his word, and gave him ſuch a dreadful kick upon the head, as ſtruck him to the bottom of the abyſs, where he has remain'd ever ſince. The only fruit he got by his repentance, is, that he enjoys as much happineſs in that place as if he were in heaven. The moment Vamana reſted his foot acroſs, he not only touch'd the egg-ſhell in which the worlds are inclos'd, but unfortunately crack'd it, when the water in which this egg-ſhell ſwims, began to ruſh in at the crack. Brahma immediately taking up a veſſel, catch'd part of the water that run from it, and therewith waſh'd the feet of Viſtnou; and as for the reſt, it flow'd like a river in the paradiſe of Devendre; but 'twas brought down upon the earth by another accident.

A Settrea named Sagara [a] Jackraverti, a perſon of great authority, was for offering a white horſe in ſacrifice. This kind of Jagam is attended with great difficulties, and is not to be perform'd by all perſons indifferently; for a man before he attempts it, muſt be ſure that he will not be oppos'd by a perſon more powerful than himſelf. The perſon who intends to make this oblation, ſends the horſe appointed for the ſacrifice up and down the whole country. On the tail of the victim a writing is fix'd, containing the name of the perſon who intends to celebrate the Jagam; when it is ask'd, whether any perſon dares ſeize upon that horſe, ſpecifying at the ſame time the number of perſons who attend upon him. If any man offers to oppoſe them, and the eſcorte of the victim happens to be routed, the Jagam is laid aſide; but if there be no obſtacle, the Jagam is offer'd at the time appointed. Sagara Jackraverti being deſirous of obtaining that honour, cauſed the white horſe to be eſcorted by a great number of women, who were accompanied by ſixty thouſand young men. They met with no oppoſition, but Devendre obſerving they march'd with too haughty an air, ſtole away the horſe, hid him under the ſeventh world, and tied him behind a very devout Viſtnouva. Thoſe who attended upon the horſe, finding him gone, ſought for him every where, but to no purpoſe; nor would they ever have had any news of him, had it not been for a Akaſvani, or fluttering demon, who heard where he was. The multitude, in order to arrive at the ſeventh world, dug ſo deep into the bowels of the earth, that they at laſt were at a loſs how to throw it up; however they thought of an expedient, which was to eat it, and in order to ſwallow it down the more eaſily, they drank a great quantity of water. At length they got to the place where the horſe was, and imagining the Viſtnouva had ſtole it away, they fell to beating him. The ſaint being hurt by their blows, curs'd them, upon which they were immediately reduced to aſhes, together with their leader. This ſon being in great pain for his father, deſcended into the pit which had been dug, and got down to the Viſtnouva; however he, inſtead of uſing opprobrious language, conjur'd him to declare what was become of his father whom he was ſeeking after; but how great was his grief upon his being told, that he was now no more than a heap of aſhes; and, to heighten his diſtreſs, that all thoſe ſouls were unhappy! The ſaint told him, him, that there was but one way left to save them, and that was to sprinkle the water of the Ganges upon their ashes, which would infallibly procure them admittance into the paradise of Devendre. The young man hearing this, took the horse, leap'd upon him, went to his grandfather, and besought him to grant him leave to do all that lay in his power for procuring some of that water. He made a vow to Vishnou, and never broke it once for thirty thousand years together, and at last died without having completed his design. Two others made the same vow one after another, and observ'd it for the same term of years, but to as little purpose as the first. A fourth, Bagireta by name, had his petition granted, after having observ'd the same things ten thousand years; because all these years added together amount to an hundred thousand, which was the time appointed for the accomplishment of their wishes. Vishnou having therefore promis'd Bagireta, to grant him whatever he should ask, he begg'd that his family which had been reduc'd to ashes, might be sprinkled with the water of the Ganges. He obtain'd that the Ganges should go where-ever he should think proper to conduct it, and finding himself in so fair a way of being indulg'd in all his desires, he wish'd that the river might descend on the mountain Chimmavontam, which is situated pretty far northward. The mountain declar'd, that so heavy a burthen would crush it to pieces, and that no one but Eswara was able to bear so great a weight. Eswara civilly offer'd Bagireta to take this river upon his head, but the Ganges had so mean an opinion of Eswara's strength, that it fancied it could crush him to pieces, and to punish him for his rashness, was preparing to oppress him with his weight; when Eswara, to shew this river how strong he was, receiv'd it and supported it upon his head, so as not to suffer one drop of it to run off. Bagireta, who did not find his account in this revenge, besought Eswara to suffer the river to run on the mountain Chimmavontam, which was accordingly granted. As the Ganges was now following Bagireta, they met with a holy man in their way, who was offering a Jagam, upon which the river dragg'd all the things which were prepar'd for it with its waves, which made him so angry, that he commanded it to come into his hand, and immediately swallow'd it all up. Bagireta seeing his hopes frustrated by this accident, besought the saint to restore him the river. This was difficult to effect, without at the same time depriving the water of its sanctifying quality, since it would be unclean whether he threw it upwards or downwards; whereupon it was agreed, that it should issue out of his thigh. From thence it follow'd Bagireta to Bengal, where it divided itself into several branches: the ashes of the sixty thousand were water'd therewith, their bodies rose again, and after having return'd thanks to their deliverer for the service he had done them, they ascended to the heaven of Devendre. These particulars which we meet with in the Vedam, furnish us with the explication of three other names that the Indians give to the Ganges; for first they call it the celestial river, because they suppos'd it really descended from heaven: this possibly might have been borrow'd from the account Moses gives of the four rivers that issued out of Eden, or the terrestrial paradise; which having been known to the antient heathens, and explain'd according to the false notions they had of it, 'tis not impossible but they may have confounded this paradise with heaven, and that the name of heavenly river, tho' fabulous in the sense they give it, may yet be founded on truth. Secondly, they call it Jennadi, or the river of the thigh. Its third name is Bagireti; but 'tis commonly called Gange, which the Indians pronounce Ganga, a name of some antiquity, since 'twas used by the Greeks and Romans, except that they chang'd the termination a little, in order to accommodate it to the genius of their respective languages.

CHAP. XVI.

The Pilgrimages of the Bramins.

ACcording to the Bramins, the condition of a man who dies in ſin is not altogether deſperate; and theſe imagine, they have certain reſſources, by which they procure the remiſſion of ſuch a perſon's ſins, as effectually as if he himſelf perform'd what they do for him. The Ganges is to theſe people an inexhauſtible fund of holineſs. Whenever they meet with any human bones, they gather them up in a very devout manner, and throw them into this river, and fancy that for every year they continue therein, the ſoul of the creature to whom they belong'd, enjoys a thouſand years of felicity in the heaven of Devendre. Its waters however have not the virtue of cleanſing ſinners ſo thoroughly, as to procure their immediate admiſſion into heaven; it only ſecures them from being excluded it as they deſerv'd, ſince after they have reſided a certain limited time in the heaven which that river obtains them, they are doom'd to return again upon the earth, to be born again, and begin another life. However, they have this advantage when they return again upon the earth, which is, that they are not in a worſe condition than in the preceeding life, but on the contrary are happier; and this laſt ſtage or life is ſo meritorious, that the moment the ſoul leaves the body, it inſtantly takes its flight to the regions of perfect bliſs and felicity.

The pilgrimage to Gaya, a city ſituated to the ſouth, and thirty leagues from Caſi, enjoys a particular privilege, and ſalvation is there eaſily obtain'd for the dead. Here a rock is ſhewn in which, they ſay, God left the print of his foot; and for the ſecurity of ſo precious a relique, this city is fortify'd on all ſides. Here follows the order which is obſerv'd in this pilgrimage.

The Pilgrims go firſt to Preyaga, where they are allow'd to ſpend a month. Every morning before ſun-riſe, they waſh themſelves in the Ganges, to cleanſe themſelves from their ſins; the month being expir'd, they go to Caſi, where they again bathe themſelves in the river; from hence they go to Gaya, where they make a particular kind of dough. They break off ſome little pieces of it, and every time they put one of them upon the rock, they repeat the name of one of their deceas'd friends, and in this manner repeat the names of their deceas'd friends and relations to the ſeventh generation, and even higher. The Vedam promiſes, that all whoſe names are repeated in this manner, feel the immediate efficacy of it, and that tho' they were in the hell of Jamma, they yet would be immediately waſted into the manſions of Devendre.

The Bramins are not the only people who pay a ſuperſtitious honour to ſuch kinds of prints or marks. [a] The Scythians uſed to ſhew a ſtone, two cubits in length, on which they affirm'd Hercules had imprinted the mark of his foot. There are certain heathens who go in pilgrimage at this day to the pike of Adam, a high mountain in the iſland of [b] Ceylan, where, "on a ſtone table, is the print of a human foot of a gigantic ſize, "two ſpans in length and eight inches over, and travellers aſſure, it could not poſſibly "have been better ſtamp'd on wax. All the heathens in general look upon it as a "very holy place, and go in pilgrimage from all parts to this table, either to gain a "ſight of it, to worſhip it, or for the fulfilling of ſome vow." I myſelf have ſeen in ſome parts of France, particularly at Feſcamp, ſuch like prints or marks, which tradition aſſures were made by the foot of an angel. But the Bramins exceed all other nations, in the account they give of the cauſes of theſe pretended miracles.

They

[a] Herodot. lib. 4.
[b] Voyages of Nicholas de GRAAF to the Indies, pag. 108.

They tell us, that in antient times a Ratjasja, Gayasora by name, made a vow to Eswara, and having accompliſh'd it, the God appear'd to him, and ask'd him, what he deſir'd. 'Tis with the deepeſt affliction, ſays the Ratjasja, that I behold the torments which ſouls are oblig'd to ſuffer for the expiation of their ſins. Grant ſalvation to all thoſe who ſhall be ſubject to me. His requeſt being granted, he immediately ſet out to travel, and made ſuch an aſtoniſhing progreſs in all places where-ever he came, that there was not ſo much as one ſinner in the world left, ſo that he was univerſally honour'd.

Viſtnou was ſtung with jealouſy upon this account, and therefore ſought to kill Gayasora, and actually put him to death at Gaya. When the Ratjasja ſaw 'twas impoſſible for him to eſcape death, he beſought Viſtnou, to obſerve at leaſt the promiſe which Eswara had made him. Viſtnou granted his requeſt, and gave his word that all thoſe whoſe names ſhould be repeated, at the ſticking on of thoſe pieces of dough, ſhould certainly be ſav'd: this being done, Viſtnou ſet one foot upon his head, when Gayasora was immediately chang'd into a rock, and this, according to the Bramins, is the very ſame with that which is now at Gaya.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Proverbs of Barthrouherri; and the Concluſion of the Work.

THE blind and implicit belief which this nation gives to the moſt romantic traditions, plainly ſhews, that they make but very little uſe of their reaſon. Their ſtudies are confin'd to the Vedam, the Jaſtra, and the proverbs of Barthrouherri. I have already taken notice of the two firſt books, and will now ſpeak of the third. The reader has already ſeen, that Sandragoupeti Naraja was grievouſly afflicted when Barthrouherri his ſon, whom his wife that was of the meaneſt Caſte, had brought to him, had married three hundred wives. Barthrouherri, who was now become famous for his wiſdom, pitied mankind, in that as knowledge was compriſed in a great number of volumes, it was a very great task to read them all. To remedy this, he extracted the ſubſtance of them, and work'd them up into three hundred proverbs, which he divided into three books. Every book contains ten chapters, and in each of theſe there are ten proverbs or ſententious ſayings. The firſt book is entitled, Of the way which leads to heaven; the ſecond, Of the conduct of a rational creature; and the third treats of love.

Padmanaba the Bramin, of whom Mr. Roger receiv'd all his informations concerning the Bramins, had communicated the two firſt to him, but he [a] ſcrupled to tranſlate the third into Flemiſh.

Barthrouherri was naturally of an amorous caſt, ſo that the dread his father was under that he would get a great number of children, was very juſtly grounded. Their father having ſent for his four ſons, declar'd to the three firſt, that he was very well ſatisfy'd with their conduct, but that he could not look upon Barthrouherri, who was the fourth, without grief and uneaſineſs. The laſt gueſſing the occaſion of it, went out of the room, got his hair cut off, put on the habit of a Sanjaſi, and return'd into the room. His father, overjoy'd at this change, bleſſed him, and promiſed he ſhould live to the end of the world; nor was this promiſe an idle one, for Barthrouherri is actually upon the earth at at this time, but inviſibly, after the manner of ſpirits. After the death of his father he began his travels; and his three hundred wives deſiring to follow him, he bid them ſtay where they were, and told them they need not give themſelves the trouble of accompanying him in his travels. Hearing this, they ask'd him what wou'd become of them in their deplorable widow'd ſtate; upon which he gave them leave to marry other men, and aſſur'd them they might do it without incurring any guilt. They obey'd his commands, and 'tis from them that ſprung the family of the three hundred, or of the Cauvreas, a numerous family among the Soudras. Theſe women are allow'd to live in widowhood with impunity, and may marry again without injuring their reputations, or being guilty of ſin. All other families are admitted into that of the Cauvreas, and 'tis compar'd to the ſea, into which all rivers in general empty themſelves.

Thus have I given the reader the moſt eſſential particulars I obſerv'd in Mr. Roger's relation, but have omitted a great number of refutations, as judging them to be needleſs. 'Tis enough, when we are deſirous of confuting any wild or extravagant poſitions, barely to quote them. I choſe to make uſe of this author rather than any other, becauſe as he was by profeſſion a divine, it was more natural for him to enquire into the religion of the Bramins, than either phyſicians or merchants. His great familiarity with Padmanaba the Bramin, ſtamps a certain credit on what he ſays, which neither Father [a] Kircher, nor many others who have written after him, can boaſt, ſince they receiv'd it from the ſecond or third hand. Proper names are not always ſpelt as in other relations; for ſince every writer made uſe of ſuch letters as he imagin'd wou'd beſt expreſs the ſound of thoſe words, they muſt conſequently have employ'd the orthography which was moſt natural to their mother tongue. 'Tis for this reaſon, that in a Confeſſion of faith of the Bramins, which we are told one of them gave to Arnaud Heüſſen the Dutch Governor, we find Iſura inſtead of Eſwara; Bromha for Brahma; Viſnauwa for Viſtnou, and ſo on. I choſe rather to follow Mr. Roger's orthography, becauſe he was a man of letters, and therefore thought I might better depend upon it, than that which had been uſed by mere traders; however, I muſt inform the reader that I retrench'd certain mute or ſuperfluous letters.

All I have now to add, is, that what I have related with regard to the original of the Brachmans, whom I take to be ſprung from an Egyptian colony, is ſufficiently prov'd by the conformity of their ſuperſtitious practices with thoſe of that antient nation; this will appear ſtill more evident, if we compare what Herodotus has written on that ſubject with the foregoing diſſertation: but it would have been impoſſible for me to have drawn this parallel, without exceeding the bounds and the plan which I had laid down.

ON THE

GODS of the EAST-INDIANS.

CHAP. I.

THE Indian idolaters whom we call Gentiles, unanimouſly agree that there is one God; but there is not one among them, who does not form ſuch ideas to himſelf, as are altogether unworthy the holineſs and majeſty of the ſupreme Being.

Theſe miſtaken people have certain books, in which all they are to believe is contain'd; which are of as great authority among them as the holy ſcriptures with us. In ſome parts of theſe books, God is declar'd to be a ſpiritual, an immenſe, and eternal ſubſtance; in others we are told, that there is no other God than the air we breathe; in others again, that the ſun is God, and that he only creates, preſerves, and deſtroys all things. This laſt opinion is one of the moſt general, inſomuch that the greateſt part of theſe idolaters worſhip this planet, proſtrating themſelves ſeveral times on the ground at his riſing and ſetting. This unhappy people being thus dazzled, or rather blinded by the ſun's dazzling light, confine themſelves to the creature, and pay him that homage which is due to the creator only.

Great numbers among the Gentiles are of opinion, that [a] boil'd rice only merits to be worſhipp'd as God; theſe before they begin to eat it, always pay it the moſt profound veneration.

Theſe worſhippers of the rice they feed upon, do yet agree in, and acknowledge the Being of another God call'd Parama-Bruma, that is, very ſublime, and moſt excellent knowledge; and affirm that the letter O is this Divinity; or rather, repreſent it by this ſymbol or hieroglyphic, and believe that thoſe who are propitious enough to repeat it with their dying breath, are infallibly ſure of going directly to heaven, and of their enjoying a fulneſs of glory.

Theſe bleſſed ſouls, ſay they, iſſuing out of their bodies through the crown of the head, fly with the ſwiftneſs of an arrow through the ſun, when they go and enjoy an eternity of bliſs. The Indian ſect that follows this opinion is very numerous, and a very conſiderable one; and they alſo believe that there are three hundred and thirty thouſand millions of Gods, beſides Parama-Bruma, and that thoſe are all ſubordinate to Devandiren, another God, of whom we ſhall ſpeak at large in the ſequel, after having explain'd the wild and extravagant notions theſe infidels have of the trinity; notions which are altogether unworthy not only of God, but even of men, who had the leaſt ſenſe, modeſty, or reaſon left.

CHAP.

[a] Boil'd rice is the common food of the Indians; and as it preſerves health and life, they are therefore prompted to think, 'tis either God, or has ſomething divine in it.

CHAP. II.

The notion the Heathens have of the Trinity, expreſs'd under the names of Bruma, Vixnu, and of Rutrem.

MOST of the doctors among the heathens, ſay, that there was in the beginning a woman call'd Paraxacti, ſignifying very excellent and very ſublime power. This woman had three ſons, the firſt whereof, who was born with five heads, was call'd by his mother, Bruma, that is knowledge, and ſhe gave him the power of creating alone all things viſible and inviſible. Vixnu was the name of the ſecond, whoſe mother inveſted him with the power of preſerving all things his brother had created. Paraxacti call'd her third ſon Rutrem, and gave him the power of deſtroying and annihilating every thing his brothers had created and preſerv'd: Rutrem like his brother Bruma had five heads, and theſe three brethren married their mother who had brought them forth.

The Gentiles, who never agree in point of doctrine, are divided, with regard to this article into ſix principal ſects, who all differ very widely from one another. Some of theſe maintain, that Paraxacti is alone the firſt cauſe of all things, and conſequently ought to be worſhip'd as the only true God; others aſſert 'tis Bruma; and again, others, who compoſe the greateſt number, maintain, that Vixnu ought to be look'd upon as the firſt principle. Some aſcribe this ſupreme quality to Rutrem. There are others again, who in order to reconcile theſe different opinions, will not allow that any one of the three brothers ſeparately is God, but that this ſublime name belongs in an indiviſible manner to all the three, and that they ought to be jointly acknowledg'd, and worſhip'd as ſuch: in fine, there are ſome who deny that theſe three brethren are the ſupreme God, either jointly, or ſeparately, but teach that there is another God, infinitely ſuperior to them all, and that his eſſence is incomprehenſible.

This laſt notion would undoubtedly be the moſt rational, was it not ſullied by a numberleſs multitude of fabulous, ridiculous and contradictory articles. Inſomuch that the various opinions of theſe miſtaken people, verify literally what the Holy Ghoſt has ſpoken by the mouth of the [a] wiſe man, viz. that the fool changes like the moon.

We ſhall now ſee what thoſe books, which contain'd the law and the doctrine of theſe heathens, relate particularly of the lives and infamous actions of their deteſtable Deities.

CHAP. III.

The Adventures of Bruma.

'TIS related in the HISTORY. of the Gods of the heathen eaſterns, that Bruma who is the eldeſt ſon and husband of Paraxacti, ſprang originally from the navel of his brother Vixnu, which certainly is incomprehenſible; and that Bramens, or Bragmens, iſſued from the face of this God Bruma.

The heathen Indian prieſts compoſe the moſt noble, and at the ſame time the moſt abominable tribe or caſte among the Indians, ſince there is none ſo fill'd with ſelf-love, or ſo much reſpected by the people as this, tho' there is not any one whoſe manners are more diſſolute, or more corrupted. Theſe Bramins have not only the arrogance to aſcribe to themſelves the abovemention'd original, but even preſume to aſſert expreſſly, that they are really and actually the very ſubſtance of the God Bruma.

The

[a] Stultus ut luna mutatur: Eccleſiaſticus.

The Rajas or Gentlemen who compoſe the moſt noble tribe after that of the Bramins, ſprang from the ſhoulders of the abovementioned God.

The Comatis, who are as our wealthy Citizens, and of a rank between the nobility and the traders, iſſued from his thighs; and laſtly the Xutres, whoſe tribe is ſubdivided into a numberleſs multitude of others, and which includes all the inferior ſort of people, ſprang originally from his feet.

The Xutres are chiefly employ'd in traffic, by which means ſeveral acquire great wealth; for this reaſon a great number of poor Bramins, notwithſtanding the mean extraction of the Xutres, apply to them, and do them certain ſervices notwithſtanding their being of a much ſuperior Caſte.

The God Bruma, according to the heathen divines, never fails at the inſtant of each man's birth, of what tribe or nation ſoever he be, to write on this head in indelible characters, every thing he is to do, as well as whatever is to befall him during his life; and that 'tis not in the power of either man, of Bruma, or any other God, to prevent what was written from coming to paſs.

We are told in the abovemention'd hiſtory of the Gods, that Bruma deſirous of taking his own daughter to wife, and foreſeeing that ſhe would not only ſcruple to conſent to it, but alſo that their nuptials would be diſapprov'd by the reſt of the Gods, aſſum'd the ſhape of a ſtag, upon which he purſued his daughter who fled from him, 'till ſhe got into a very dark and gloomy foreſt, when overtaking her, he there conſummated their inceſtuous marriage. However, notwithſtanding Bruma conceal'd himſelf as much as poſſible, yet Vixnu, Rutrem, and the thirty thouſand millions of Gods heard what he had done, and all reſented it ſo much, that they unanimouſly agreed to puniſh him for his incontinency by cutting off one of his heads. Rutrem was ordered to put this ſentence in execution, when immediately he ſearch'd for his brother Bruma in all places, and at laſt meeting with him, he, without employing either a ſword or hanger, took off one of his heads with one ſtroke of his nails, which were very long and ſharp, and ſince this time Bruma has had but four. To commemorate this action, no more temples have been dedicated, nor any more ſtatues been erected to his honour under an human ſhape.

The Bramins, who are the moſt artful and moſt inſolent ſet of people among the heathens, aſſert, that as they themſelves are ſubſtantially the God Bruma, the people ought therefore to venerate and pay their vows to them only; and that there is not a more ſure means of attaining an eternity of bliſs after death, than to beſtow liberally upon them the good things of this world. In ſhort, whatever the Bramins give out on religious matters, the Eaſterns receive as ſo many articles of faith.

Bruma, not being ſatisfied with having married his own daughter, took another woman call'd Saraſſuadi to wife, who was prodigiouſly learned. Her name is had in ſo great veneration among the heathens, that in teſtimony of their reſpect, and the confidence they repoſe in her virtue, they repeat it a numberleſs multitude of times every day.

Since the time that ſtatues have been no longer erected to Bruma, as was the cuſtom before he had loſt one of his heads, the Bramins worſhip him under the idea that the Greeks and Romans had antiently of the God Priapus, and look upon that as a Deity, which the heathens of all nations have ſhadow'd under this name. The idols, or repreſentations of Priapus, which are erected in honour of Bruma, are, in the Indies, called Lingam.

CHAP. IV.

The Adventures of Vixnu.

THE books of the Indians, which contain the hiſtory of their Gods, relate that Vixnu is the ſecond ſon of Paraxacti and alſo her husband. This Vixnu is in ſome places call'd the firſt cauſe, and the principle of all things created. 'Tis ſaid that he married a wife, Laximi by name; who is at one and the ſame time, a cow, a horſe, a mountain, gold, ſilver, and whatever can be wiſh'd or imagin'd. Moſt of the Indians wear the name of this woman ty'd about their necks, or arms, as a charm capable of procuring them happineſs, and of preſerving them from all ſiniſter accidents.

We alſo find in the ſame books, that Vixnu, whoſe ſect is very numerous, had made himſelf fleſh, or metamorphos'd himſelf nine times. He firſt aſſum'd the ſhape of a fiſh, but the occaſion of this metamorphoſis is not known.

In the ſecond he aſſum'd the form of a tortoiſe, and that for a very whimſical reaſon, which is as follows: The Indians relate, that there are ſeven ſeas in the world which we inhabit; one of theſe is of milk, whereof a moſt delicious butter is made, and of this the Gods are very dainty. Now it happen'd, that as they were one day going to take of this butter, as was the uſual cuſtom, they brought, but not without the utmoſt labour and difficulty, on the ſhore of that ſea of milk, a high mountain of gold, call'd Magameru Parruvadam; which the heathens tell us, ſupports the fourteen worlds whereof this univerſe is compos'd. The top of this mountain ſerv'd them for a beam, over which they brought an adder of a prodigious ſize, having an hundred heads, on which the fourteen worlds are alſo ſupported. The Gods made uſe of this adder as of a rope, in order to get the butter more eaſily; but while they were labouring on one ſide, the giants, who have ever been enemies to the Gods, drew the adder on the other ſide with ſo much violence, as at once ſhook the world, and made it ſink lower down, ſo that it was juſt going to be turn'd topſy-turvy, when Vixnu perceiving it, he immediately aſſum'd the ſhape of a tortoiſe, and plac'd himſelf under the world in order to ſupport it. On the other ſide, the hundred-headed adder, unable any longer to endure the pain which the Gods and giants put it to, by their drawing it ſeveral ways, vomited ſuddenly on the latter a liquor of ſo malignant a quality, that it kill'd the greateſt part of them on the ſpot.

However Vixnu did not ſtop here; for being afraid leſt the ſurviving giants ſhould eat part of this excellent butter, which had been got with ſo much labour and danger; to prevent them, he aſſum'd the ſhape of a very beautiful woman, and theſe giants immediately fell diſtractedly in love with her. By this artifice he amus'd them, till ſuch time as the Gods had either eat or carried off all the butter; which being done, he vaniſh'd away in an inſtant, leaving the giants in the utmoſt aſtoniſhment at their having loſt the ſight of the woman whoſe beauty had dazled them, and of the divine butter for which they had taken ſo much pains.

In the third incarnation, Vixnu chang'd himſelf into a hog, which was as follows.

There one day aroſe a conteſt between the Gods Bruma, Vixnu and Rutrem, about who was the greateſt of the three. Upon this, Rutrem propos'd to Bruma and Vixnu his brethren, to go and hide himſelf, and promiſed to ſubmit himſelf to him who ſhould find out his head and his feet, and that the other two ſhould acknowledge him as chief; to which Bruma and Vixnu giving their conſent, Rutrem immediately vaniſh'd, and hid his head and feet in places that were at a great diſtance one from the other.

Bruma immediately ſet out in ſearch of the head, and the better to ſucceed in it, transform'd himſelf into a ſwan, flew about on every ſide, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours to get information of what he was looking for; but finding that all his care and pains were to no purpoſe, he began to deſpair of ſucceſs. He was juſt going to give over his ſearch, when he met the thiſtle-flower, which came and ſaluted him in a very courteous manner, and ſhew'd him the place where Rutrem had hid his head. Bruma, overjoy'd with this information, ran immediately to the place which the flower had pointed out to him, and there found his brother's head, who was vex'd to the ſoul at Bruma's having ſucceeded in what he had thought an impoſſibility. Being now highly exaſperated againſt the flower which had thus diſcover'd him, he pronounced a curſe againſt it, and forbid it ever to appear in his preſence; and for this reaſon, the whole tribe of thoſe call'd Andis, who are the followers of Rutrem, never put any of thoſe flowers in the temples dedicated to that God. He alſo curſed his brother, and far from acknowledging him to be his ſuperior, as had been agreed upon between them, he on the contrary vented the moſt horrid imprecations againſt him, and wiſh'd he might thenceforward be no longer worſhipped; have no more temples or ſtatues dedicated to him, or any more ſacrifices offer'd in his honour; all which is very ſtrictly obſerv'd in thoſe places where the ſect of Rutrem prevails.

Rutrem's head being thus found, all they had to do was to ſeek out the place where he had hid his feet, for which purpoſe Vixnu transform'd himſelf into a hog. In this ſhape he ran up and down every where, digging as low as the very bowels of the earth, but in vain; he came out of the earth as much a hog, but much dirtier than he had gone into it, and without having found what he ſought. 'Tis nevertheleſs in commemoration of this noble metamorphoſis, that Vixnu is worſhipped under the ſhape of a hog by perſons of the greateſt diſtinction among the heathen Indians.

CHAP. V.

Sequel of the Adventures of Vixnu.

THE fourth time that Vixnu aſſum'd the fleſh, he chang'd himſelf into a man and a lion at one and the ſame time; the occaſion of which was as follows: There was a mighty giant in the world, Iranien by name. Rutrem, to whom this giant had religiouſly devoted himſelf for a certain time, had granted him a very ſingular privilege, which was, that no one could kill him either by night or by day; in his houſe or out of it. This extraordinary grant, far from making a virtuous impreſſion on the mind of this giant, made him on the contrary ſo proud, ſo haughty and ſo inſolent, that he not only ceaſed to honour his benefactor, but alſo reſolved to prevent any one from that time forward, from invoking either Rutrem, or any other of the Gods; and threatned to inflict very grievous torments, on all ſuch as ſhould even preſume to repeat their very names. But while the world thus trembled and groan'd under the tyranny of Iranien, no one daring to implore the aſſiſtance of the Gods; the ſon of this impious giant, Pragaladen by name, deſpiſed his father's threats, and inſtead of repeating his name in ſuch prayers as his tutor had made him ſay before he ſaid his leſſons, he always repeated the name of the God Vixnu, to whom he very religiouſly adher'd.

The child's maſter frequently reprimanded him upon that account, and fearing, in caſe it came to his father's knowledge, he ſhould be puniſh'd, as one who had conniv'd at his ſon's diſobedience, he himſelf went and accuſed his ſcholar, and told Iranien, that he could not poſſibly prevail upon the child to leave off addreſſing his uſual prayers to Vixnu, tho' he had employ'd his utmoſt endeavours. This put the giant into a great rage, when ſending for his ſon, he reprov'd him in very harſh terms, and threatned, in caſe he did not change his conduct, to caſt him among adders, bears, tygers, and elephants.

The

The child was not to be wrought upon by theſe threats, but continued to direct his prayers to Vixnu, whoſe protection ſecur'd him from all the dangers to which his father's cruelty expos'd him. However the God being at laſt enrag'd at the giant's invincible obſtinacy, he reſolv'd to kill him, and by that means put an end to all the difficulties which young Pragaladen labour'd under. However Vixnu could not eaſily compaſs his deſign, becauſe of the privilege which Rutrem had granted the giant, not to mention that one God ſeldom deſtroys the work of another; but then on the other ſide, as the Gods very ſeldom fail in any thing they once undertake, Vixnu had recourſe to a ſtratagem. He ruſh'd out in a moment from a pillar of air, and appear'd ſuddenly before the giant under the ſhape of a monſter who was half man and half lion, and that at the very inſtant after ſun-ſet, at which time 'tis properly neither day nor night. He then flung himſelf on a ſudden upon Iranien, who happen'd to ſtand on the threſhold of the door of his houſe, and conſequently was neither in nor out of it. By this artifice Vixnu, without violating the giant's privilege, tore him to pieces, pluck'd out his bowels, and drank even to the very laſt drop of his blood; but this infamous liquor had ſuch an ill effect upon Vixnu's brain, that he has been a little out of his ſenſes ever ſince.

Vixnu, the fifth time he aſſum'd the fleſh, chang'd himſelf into a dwarf, upon the following occaſion.

During a certain period, there was but one king upon the earth, Magapelixacravarti by name, who was a giant of an enormous ſize, and the moſt blood-thirſty wretch that had ever liv'd upon earth. Mankind, after having long groan'd under his tyranny, addreſs'd themſelves to the Gods in order to be freed from it. Vixnu had compaſſion on their miſery, and therefore reſolv'd to deſtroy this deteſtable monarch; and the better to ſucceed in it, aſſum'd the ſhape of a Bramin dwarf, one of the moſt diminutive of that kind, and went by the name of Chamavamanen. Thus diſguiſed, Vixnu went to the city where Magapelixacravarti uſually kept his court, when he enter'd his palace, preſented himſelf before him, and beſought him to grant him three foot of ground, to build a houſe for himſelf to live in. The king look'd upon this as ſo trifling a requeſt, that he was going to grant it immediately, when the morning-ſtar, who attended upon him in quality of his counſellor of ſtate, fearing there was ſome treaſon conceal'd under it, reſolved to hinder the grant paſſing. The morning-ſtar knew it was neceſſary at that time, in order to a favour's being granted in a ſolemn manner ſo as not to be repeal'd, that the king ſhould take ſome water in his mouth, and pour part of it into the hand of that perſon who receiv'd the grant. The ſtar, to prevent this eſſential ceremony, without which the grant would be invalid, employ'd magic, in which it was greatly skill'd; and metamorphoſing itſelf in an inſtant, ſlipp'd unperceiv'd down the prince's throat, in order to keep the water which he had in his mouth from coming up again. However the magic which the ſtar made uſe of had not all its deſir'd effect; for the king finding his throat ſtopp'd without knowing the cauſe of it, and being unable to breathe but with extreme difficulty, he order'd an iron ſtilleto to be brought him, which being come, he thruſt it a pretty way down his throat; but unhappily, he, with this weapon, thruſt out one of the faithful ſtar's eyes, who undoubtedly had deſerved a better fate; and at the ſame time open'd a paſſage for the water to go through, which he accordingly pour'd on the hand of the God who was chang'd into a dwarf; and by this ſolemn oath, ratified the gift he had made him of the requeſted land. Vixnu deſirous of taking poſſeſſion of it, chang'd his ſhape, and aſſum'd one very different from what he had before appear'd under, when he firſt ſpoke to this wicked prince. He ſwell'd to ſuch a prodigious ſize, that all the air and the whole earth ſcarce afforded him room to ſet one of his feet; when addreſſing himſelf to the king, he ſaid to him as follows: Thou haſt given me three foot of earth, ſcarce is there room enough in all the viſible world for the placing of one of my feet, where therefore muſt I ſet the other? The unhappy Magapelixacravarti, who now was ſenſible, tho' too late, that he had been over-reach'd by a ſtratagem, fell proſtrate before Vixnu, worſhipp'd him, and preſented him his head, in order for the placing of his other foot. The angry God accepted the offer, ſet his foot upon his head, and with a ſingle kick drove him to the loweſt abyſs of hell. This wretched monarch, notwithſtanding the unhappy condition to which he was reduc'd, ſtill addreſs'd himſelf to Vixnu, (who abuſing his credulity, had ſo cruelly deceiv'd him) and ask'd him how long his torments ſhould continue. The God anſwer'd they would be eternal, however that he ſhould be permitted to come annually out of hell on a certain day in November which he named; when he might go upon the earth in order to aſſiſt at a ceremony, which ſhould be eſtabliſh'd and celebrated in commemoration of this ſad adventure, and is ſtill obſerv'd very regularly every year by Vixnu's followers.

CHAP. VI.

Sequel of the Hiſtory of Vixnu.

VIXNU chang'd himſelf into a man, and went by the name of Rameni or Ram, in his ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth incarnation.

The firſt of theſe three metamorphoſes, happen'd upon occaſion of a certain tribe or kind of men call'd Rajas, or petty kings, who were become ſo haughty and inſupportable, that it was impoſſible for any mortal to be longer ſafe upon the earth.

Theſe petty tyrants behav'd with the utmoſt inhumanity towards every one, threw all things into diſorder and confuſion, and even prevented the religious from fulfilling the penances they had enjoin'd themſelves in honour of the Gods. Vixnu bore the inſolence of theſe Rajas for a long time, but at laſt his patience being worn out, he aſſum'd the fleſh, made himſelf a Ram or Ramen, and in that quality declared war againſt them, which continued for twenty-one generations. Several battles were fought between the Rajas and Ram, who always came off victorious; he often waſh'd himſelf in the blood of theſe impious wretches, and at laſt utterly deſtroy'd them, ſo that not ſo much as one of them ſurviv'd.

Vixnu aſſum'd the human ſhape a ſecond time, and went by the ſame name of Ram, purpoſely to extirpate a dreadful giant, whoſe name was Cartaſuciriargunen. This monſter had a thouſand arms, and was become ſo formidable, that no one dar'd to reſiſt him. Ram preſented himſelf before him, fought him, and with no other weapon than a plough-ſhare, knock'd him down and cut off his thouſand arms. He did not obtain this victory without vaſt difficulty, and to perpetuate the remembrance thereof to poſterity, he raiſed a kind of trophy with the bones of the giant, which he had broke, and heap'd up one upon another, and theſe are ſince ſwell'd to a very high mountain.

The laſt of the three times that Vixnu made himſelf Ram was on the following occaſion.

There were upon the earth three mighty giants who were brothers, the firſt was call'd Ravanen, the ſecond Cambucarnem, and the third Vibuxanen. Theſe three brethren had for many years waged war with the Gods with very great armies, compoſed of other giants, but ſomething inferior to them in ſtature. They had even frequently rallied Vixnu in ſecret ſince his becoming Ram, and had carried their inſolence to ſuch a pitch, as to carry off his wife, named Sidi. Ram was greatly offended at their injurious proceedings, but notwithſtanding his ſtrict ſearch, he yet was not able to find where they had conceal'd her. A thirſt of revenge made him redouble his efforts againſt the giants, but finding he had fought them for a long time with very little ſucceſs, he addreſs'd himſelf to the apes, and deſir'd their aſſiſtance.

Theſe animals, overjoy'd to meet with ſo glorious an opportunity of doing ſervice to Vixnu, aſſembled in a body, made a numerous army, and went and join'd him with this reinforcement. Ram gave the giants battle, defeated them, and deliver'd his wife from the captivity under which ſhe had groan'd for twelve years. We ſhall afterwards relate the particulars of that war, in which Ram and his allies perform'd the moſt ſurprizing exploits.

Ram at firſt made no difficulty of taking his wife Sidi back again, and living with her as before; however not long after he left her, and went and travelled up and down the world like a pilgrim. The reaſon of this abandoning her, was, that happening one day to paſs by a pond, he overheard ſome waſherwomen rallying him, for having taken his wife ſo eaſily back again, after ſhe had liv'd twelve years among the giants.

In fine, Vixnu aſſum'd the fleſh for the ninth time; he again appear'd under an human ſhape, and was call'd Chrixnen, ſignifying black man. The reaſon of this metamorphoſis will be ſeen in the following chapter.

CHAP. VII.

The laſt Incarnation of the God Vixnu.

ONCE upon a time the whole world was govern'd by a ſingle monarch, Campſen by name, who was a very vicious prince, an enemy and perſecutor of all good people, and of penitents in particular. He had a ſiſter whoſe name was Exudi, and the ſoothſayers having told him he ſhould be kill'd by the eighth child which ſhe ſhould be deliver'd of, he conceiv'd ſo great a hatred againſt Exudi and her children, that he cauſed them to be murder'd the moment they were born. This barbarous treatment threw the princeſs into the deepeſt affliction, who nevertheleſs was again big of her eighth child. She did not know that the God Vixnu was within her, who had then aſſum'd the fleſh a ninth time; or that the child ſhe then went with, was he, who, according to the prophecies, was to put his uncle to death, becauſe the king had conceal'd from every one what the ſoothſayers had told him. She only remember'd, and with the deepeſt pangs, that her ſeven firſt children had been all inhumanly butcher'd in her preſence; and not doubting but the child ſhe was then going to be deliver'd of, would meet with the ſame fate, ſhe wiſh'd to ſecure him from the fury of her brother Campſen. For this purpoſe, the moment it was born, ſhe gave it to her husband, whom ſhe adviſed to fly away, together with the child, and hide it in ſome deſart place at a great diſtance from the court. But the king, who had a great many ſpies in the country, had exact information ſent him of the time when his ſiſter was to be deliver'd, ſo that he had diſpoſed every thing in order to deſtroy this infant as he had the other ſeven, whoſe birth muſt neceſſarily have given him leſs uneaſineſs and dread. He had poſted guards every where to prevent the young prince from eſcaping his clutches, and expected every moment to have him deliver'd into his hands; however his expectations were baulk'd, for the child's father had been ſo happy as to elude the vigilance of the ſpies, and had convey'd him to a diſtant foreſt, where he had entruſted him with certain ſhepherds, whom he enjoin'd to educate him with the utmoſt care and ſecrecy, and above all, to conceal him from the king.

Theſe honeſt, plain people, perform'd their duty to a tittle, but notwithſtanding all their endeavours to keep it ſecret from the king, he nevertheleſs got information where his nephew was, and accordingly went thither in perſon to kill him with his own hand. He had already laid hold of him, and was going to daſh out his brains againſt a rock, in order to ſecure his own life by the child's death, when Chrixnen vaniſh'd on a ſudden, and left him in great ſurprize to find he graſp'd only a little girl whom his nephew had had ſubſtituted in his place. But not even this ſecond child was to fall a ſacrifice, to the fury with which the prince was inſpir'd, when he found himſelf diſappointed; for ſhe gave him ſo furious a blow, as knock'd him backward: after which, not ſatisfy'd with having treated him thus roughly, ſhe ſaid to him, Ceaſe, wretch that thou art; to wiſh for, or endeavour to kill a perſon, whom thou ſhalt never be able to hurt; and know, that at the very inſtant I am ſpeaking to thee, he whom thou ſo cruelly perſecuteſt, is in a place of ſafety, and has no occaſion to be in any dread upon thy account.

'Twou'd be almoſt impoſſible to expreſs the rage with which Campſen was fir'd, when after having heard the child utter theſe words, ſhe alſo vaniſh'd in an inſtant; and that he found his nephew had not only eſcap'd him, but alſo laugh'd at all his fury. He did his utmoſt to find the place where he was; commanded all his ſubjects to make a ſtrict ſearch for him, and to bring him dead or alive; he laid the ſame injunction on all the giants who inhabited the different parts of his dominions; however all theſe precautions were of no effect, and not one of them were able to execute the king's orders. At laſt, this prince addreſs'd the devils, and implor'd their aſſiſtance, which, he flatter'd himſelf, would give him an opportunity of deſtroying his nephew. However Chrixnen eſcap'd the ſnares which thoſe infernal ſpirits laid for him, with the ſame caſe and good fortune, as he had avoided thoſe of the giants; and as theſe various cruelties of his uncle were a proof of his violent hatred, and that he was ſtrongly bent on his deſtruction, he on the other ſide endeavour'd as much as poſſible to prevent his falling a victim to the fury of that wicked prince. Chrixnen, tho' but a very young child, had yet the ſenſe and penetration to diſcover that the woman whom they had given him to ſuck was a witch, and that the devils, by the king's inſtigation, had artfully ſubſtituted her in the place of his real nurſe. The deſign of theſe wicked ſpirits was, that ſhe ſhould give the babe poiſon inſtead of milk; but Chrixnen diſappointed them, for he ſuck'd her with ſo much violence, that having firſt drawn out all her milk, he afterwards ſuck'd out all her blood, nor left off till ſhe was quite dead, and by that means deliver'd himſelf from imminent danger.

Chrixnen being now ſomething older, began to play the ſhepherds, among whom he had been brought up, a great many roguiſh pranks. One day he ſtole a great quantity of butter from them, and was going to fly away with his booty, but did not eſcape the ſhepherds as fortunately as he had done the king. Theſe purſued, came up with, and took from him the butter he had ſtole; when tying him to a tree, they whip'd him, in order by this chaſtiſement to prevent his committing any ſuch tricks for the future. Being grown up to man's eſtate, he raiſed an army, went and attack'd his uncle, engag'd him in ſeveral battles, and at laſt kill'd him with his own hand, and by this means rid himſelf of an irreconcileable and moſt dangerous enemy. Being afterwards deſirous of unbending himſelf, after the great pains and fatigues he had undergone during this war, he married two wives of his own tribe, but theſe not ſatisfying him, he took ſixteen thouſand young ſhepherdeſſes for his concubines. He had not forgot how ſeverely he had been whip'd formerly in their father's houſe, and was afraid that ſomething of the ſame nature would happen to him, in caſe he ſhould have the ill luck to diſpleaſe thoſe ſhepherds. However, to obviate every thing of this nature, and that he might not give them any ſubject of complaint, he multiplied himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he lay with them all at the ſame time, and made each of them believe, that he had abandon'd all the reſt to give himſelf to her only, and by this artifice was equally belov'd by them all.

Chrixnen, or rather Vixnu under the ſhape of Chrixnen, ſtood one day on the ſide of a pond, in which a great number of very beautiful and very virtuous women of quality were bathing themſelves. Chrixnen on a ſudden took up all their clothes and carried them to the top of a very high tree, which ſtood not far from the pond, ſo that the ladies would have been obliged to come naked out of the water, and walk to their houſes in that manner. Whilſt they were in this perplexity, and looking about on all ſides, they perceiv'd certain large leaves growing in the water, which very much reſembled thoſe of the water-lilly; immediately they each gather'd ſome of theſe, cover'd themſelves as well as they could, and all drew near the tree on which Chrixnen had climb'd. Then all the afflicted ladies beſought him earneſtly to return them their clothes; but their intreaties were ineffectual, till after they had ſaluted him, by each laying her two hands on her head; which they no ſooner did than the leaves fell from them, when they were ſtark naked, which was juſt what Vixnu wanted, and the only motive of his carrying off their clothes.

The heathens pretend that Vixnu will aſſume the fleſh once more, and come under the ſhape of a horſe, and that till ſuch time as this metamorphoſis is to happen, he wallows in the ſea of milk, where he lies in a delicious manner on a large beautiful adder with five heads, which at the ſame time ſerves him both for a throne and a bed.

CHAP. VIII.

The Hiſtory of Rutrem.

RUTREM, the third ſon of Paraxacti, is alſo one of her husbands, and has the greateſt ſhare in her affections. Rutrem having once upon a time a deſire of living among men, he, for that purpoſe turn'd Andi or fryar. He was call'd Artanari, i. e. half man and half woman, and never was there ſeen or heard of, a man ſo infamous, ſo irregular, and ſo abominable as this wretch. He married a daughter of the king of the mountains, whoſe name was Parvadi, and liv'd in ſtrict union with her for a thouſand years. So unprecedented a conduct in a God, was diſapproved of by Bruma, by Vixnu, and the three hundred and thirty thouſand millions of Gods, who all thinking Rutrem was out of his wits, they thereupon went in ſearch of him, and having found him, forc'd him away from Parvadi. This woman, who was as laſcivious as her husband, was greatly offended at the violence which had been uſed in tearing her from the object of her affections; and therefore to revenge herſelf of this inſult, ſhe vented imprecations againſt all the Gods, curſed them heartily, and wiſh'd that thenceforwards not one of them might have either children or lawful wives, but only as many concubines as they pleaſed; all which came to paſs according to her wiſhes. Rutrem, after he had been thus forced from his wife, went away like one diſtracted, wandred up and down the world, and left in all places thro' which he paſs'd certain indications of his [a] leudneſs. Now it happen'd, that as he was going thro' a certain place, the earth in a moment gave him a ſon with ſix heads; but as there was no nurſe there to give him ſuck, the ſeven ſtars did him that good office, and gave him the name of Camaraſſuammi, which is as much as to ſay, the lord-ſon.

All the idolaters in India have ſo profound a veneration for him, and ſo extraordinary a confidence in his power, that all their writings and records begin always with theſe words, Arrumagamtumei! i. e. O thou with ſix faces be with us! The books of the heathens relate, that Parvadi, who died with grief for having been torn from her husband, was born a ſecond time, after that the child above-mention'd had been miraculouſly brought forth in the manner related; that at this ſecond birth, ſhe was daughter of a king, Daxaprojabadi by name, and that Rutrem married her a ſecond time. That after her marriage, as ſhe was one day bathing herſelf, while her husband was abroad, ſhe had ſo ſtrong a deſire to have a child, that at that inſtant there appear'd one before her her in her hand, who ſprang from the ſweat ſhe had got together on her boſom; that this child was in an inſtant as full grown as one of twenty, and that ſhe had named him Vinayaguien, i. e. who has no God; that a little after Rutrem returning back to his houſe, altogether ignorant of what had happen'd, and caſting his eye on Vinayaguien, who was very familiar with Parvardi, his jealouſy threw him into ſuch a rage, that he reſolv'd to abandon her that moment. However, that Parvardi no ſooner perceiv'd it, but ſhe appeas'd him by relating to him how every circumſtance had happen'd; and that ſhe prevail'd ſo far upon him, that the young man whoſe preſence had at firſt given him ſo much uneaſineſs, was afterwards his joy and conſolation.

The pleaſure which Rutrem felt, when he reflected on the ſurprizing and miraculous birth of young Vinayaguien, was ſoon interrupted by the diſcontent which his father-in-law occaſion'd him. This prince reſolv'd to offer up a ſacrifice and make a ſolemn feaſt in honour of his grandſon's birth-day; and as a teſtimony of the joy it gave him, he invited all the Gods to it, his ſon-in-law excepted. 'Tis not known whether it was forgetfulneſs, or Rutrem's ill conduct that made him act in this manner. Be that as it will, this God was ſo greatly offended at the affront which the king of the mountains had put upon him, that he reſolv'd to revenge himſelf in a very bloody manner; and for this purpoſe, he went in the higheſt tranſports of rage to the place where his father-in-law was regaling all the Gods. Scarce was he enter'd into the hall where they were feaſting, but he broke out into a thouſand opprobrious expreſſions againſt the gueſts; when afterwards tearing off an handful of hair, he ſtruck it ſo violently againſt the floor, that immediately a giant of an enormous ſize ſtarted up from thence.

Scarce had the monſter appear'd, when raiſing his voice, he proteſted to revenge his inſulted father; upon which he immediately put himſelf in a poſture to attack the Gods, and perform'd the moſt ſurprizing heroic actions on this occaſion: but a circumſtance which chiefly merits our regard, is, that he gave the ſun ſo furious a box o'the ear, as knock'd all his teeth out; for which reaſon the heathens have ever ſince that time, offer'd ſuch things only in their ſacrifices to that planet, as were ſoft and eaſy to be eaten, ſuch as butter, milk, pap, and very ripe fruits.

This giant, not ſatisfy'd with treating the ſun in this injurious manner, gave likewiſe the moon ſeveral kicks on the face, and bruiſed it in ſo terrible a manner, that the marks are viſible to this day; and to this, ſay the Indians, thoſe ſpots are owing which are obſerv'd in this planet. He afterwards kill'd king Daxaprojabadi, with ſeveral of the gueſts, and cut off Vinayaguien's head, becauſe he had been the occaſion, tho' innocently, of the affront which had been put upon Rutrem, and of all the diſorders that were the conſequences of it.

At length the uproar and confuſion ceaſing, Rutrem perceiv'd among the dead bodies that of young Vinayaguien, whom, during his life-time, he had honour'd ſo far as to call him his ſon, and had lov'd him as tenderly as if he had been his real father.

Words can never expreſs the grief with which he was ſeiz'd at the ſight of this mournful ſpectacle. It grew to that height, that he was quite inconſolable for his loſs, particularly when he found 'twas the very giant to whom he himſelf had given birth, when he ſtruck his hair againſt the floor, who had cut off his head. After a moment's reflection, he reſolv'd to raiſe him again to life, coſt what it would. But as there was no poſſibility of his joining to the body the individual head which had been ſeperated from it, as it had been cut into ſeveral pieces, and ſcatter'd up and down, he therefore immediately cut off an elephant's head, and clap'd it ſo artfully on Vinayaguien's body, that it was firmly united to it, and by that means reſtor'd Vinayaguien to life. The father tranſported with joy to ſee his ſon thus reſtor'd to life, imbrac'd him, and commanded him to rove up and down the world in ſearch of a wife; upon this condition however, that he ſhould not marry till he had met with a woman as beautiful as his mother Parvardi. 'Tis for this reaſon, that the heathens place in all the avenues and the public roads, the idols of Vinayaguien in the form which he aſſum'd after his reſurrection, viz. an elephant's head; that as this gives him an opportunity of viewing all the women who paſs by him, he may thereby be the ſooner enabled to pitch upon one who reſembles his mother. However we are aſſur'd, that he has not yet found one, whoſe beauty was comparable to that of Parvardi. Some time after Vinayaguien had aſſum'd a new ſhape, and that Pullejar had been added to his former name, becauſe of this metamorphoſis; Rutrem, by the expreſs command of all the Gods, ſet out in ſearch of his brother Bruma, who had transform'd himſelf into a ſtag, and cohabited with his own daughter in the foreſts, in a very ſcandalous manner. He was a long time before he could find out the place of his reſidence; but meeting him at laſt, he cut off one of his heads; however the Bramins aſſure us, that he was guilty of a very heinous ſin in ſo doing. To do penance for it, he immediately ſtrip'd himſelf ſtark naked, cover'd his head with aſhes, and taking Bruma's skull in his hand, withdrew into the church-yards, where he ſpent whole days and nights in ſuch inceſſant weeping, as made him almoſt run diſtracted.

CHAP. IX.

Sequel of the Hiſtory of Rutrem.

RUTREM grown weary of ſo auſtere a way of life as that he had pitch'd upon, reſolv'd to quit this mournful place, and endeavour to divert himſelf. He was inform'd, that in a neighbouring deſart there were ſeveral Bramins who led very exemplary lives, and that they all had very beautiful wives. Being deſirous of inſinuating himſelf into the affections of theſe females, he went ſtark naked into the village which was inhabited by thoſe penitents, and ask'd for alms. He afterwards made a charm, and thereby inſpir'd all thoſe ladies with ſo violent a love for him, that no longer valuing their husbands or their families, they left their houſes the moment they ſaw him, and follow'd him where-ever he went. However Rutrem did not long enjoy the pleaſure which this agreeable company afforded him, but in the very ſame place, one of the moſt mortifying circumſtances befel him, that could poſſibly happen to a perſonage of ſo exalted a dignity; for all theſe penitent Bramins, exaſperated at this outrage, met together in a body, and vented the moſt dreadful imprecations againſt him. Their curſes had ſuch an effect, that to puniſh him for his unprecedented laſciviouſneſs, he was ſuddenly emaſculated, and has not ſince been able to repair this defect. This accident threw him into the deepeſt affliction; and 'twas to ſooth in ſome meaſure the pain it gave him, that he promiſed to crown all thoſe with the joys of heaven, who, on the earth, ſhould pay a peculiar honour to thoſe parts of his body which the Bramins had curs'd, and which had had the dreadful efficacy to deprive him of the uſe of them.

The people of India have been prompted to embrace this infamous and ridiculous worſhip, purely to obtain the rewards which Rutrem has annex'd to it. Not ſatisfied with offering ſacrifices to this Deity, who is the ſame with the Priapus of the antient Greeks and Romans, they repreſent him in a numberleſs multitude of ſtatues, which they place in the roads, in their houſes and temples. Theſe idols, for which the eaſtern heathens have an extraordinary veneration, are generally made of ſtone, and are call'd Lingam. The greateſt part of the Indians, eſpecially the followers of Rutrem of both ſexes, wear them at their necks, or ty'd about their heads or arms, and honour them in ſuch a manner as really merits pity.

Among theſe unfortunate Indians, there is a Caſte or tribe call'd Andis, the members of which are the moſt infamous, the moſt inſolent, the moſt impudent wretches imaginable, ginable, and the moſt addicted to every kind of debauchery and obſcenity. Of all the Indians theſe are the moſt difficult, and the moſt ſeldom converted to the chriſtian faith. Theſe abominable Andis make a trade of imitating the penance of Rutrem, by rambling up and down naked, cover'd with aſhes, and asking alms, and tho' they lead ſuch deteſtable lives, yet the reſt of the Indians revere them as ſo many ſaints. We frequently meet with people of this tribe, who make a vow to continue in ſome painful poſture, ſuch as for inſtance, the ſtanding upright in ſome pagod, for one, or perhaps ſeveral years. But as it is impoſſible to continue awake ſo long, and that when they were aſleep they might poſſibly, tho' involuntarily, change their poſture, and by that means tranſgreſs their vow, they firſt tie their hands to ſtakes, which are fix'd in the temples for that purpoſe, and hang in that manner till the time for their fulfilling their vow is accompliſhed; ſo that they ſleep ſtanding, and continue in the ſame poſture tho' they happen to be ſick, or are juſt going to expire.

There are ſeveral ſervants in theſe pagods, whoſe buſineſs is to give the penitents victuals and drink, and to clean them when they have dirtied themſelves. All the time that theſe unhappy victims of Satan continue fix'd in this manner in the pagods, they hold continually one of thoſe idols call'd Lingam in their hands; and when the time of their vow is expir'd, and that they are looſed from the ſtake; thoſe whoſe conſtitutions were vigorous enough to bear up under ſo painful and dreadful a penance, ſpend the remainder of their lives in asking alms up and down; and we daily meet with ſeveral of them in the country, whoſe arms are grown quite ſtiff; are wither'd, extended, and immoveable, becauſe the joints, from their continuing too long in one poſture, are quite numb'd, and loſe the faculty of motion. A man who was to ſee theſe Andis at a diſtance, would take them for ſo many walking trees, their arms reſembling pretty much branches, and their bodies the trunk. The only advantage theſe unhappy wretches gain by all their mortification and auſterities, is, that they are univerſally honour'd as ſo many ſaints, whoſe prayers are thought to have the virtue, to obtain from the Gods whatever they may requeſt of them.

CHAP. X.

Sequel of the Hiſtory of Rutrem.

'TWAS now a long time ſince Rutrem had been curſed by the Bramins, when he married the river Ganges, whom the Indians look upon as a very beautiful woman, but had no children by her for the reaſons above-mention'd. He had a multitude of ſingular adventures beſides, part whereof were unhappy and others very facetious ones. In fine, he one day found himſelf expoſed to the greateſt danger he had ever run, and had not his brother Vixnu come in very ſeaſonably to his aſſiſtance, 'twould infallibly have been fatal to him.

There was a certain giant, Paimejuran by name, i. e. lord of the aſhes, who for ſeveral years together had undergone a very rigorous penance in honour of Rutrem, whom he earneſtly beſought to beſtow ſome ſignal favour upon him, which might diſtinguiſh him from the reſt of mortals. Rutrem deſirous of rewarding his zeal and devotion, inconſiderately granted him a power to reduce in a moment to aſhes, whatever he ſhould lay his hands upon. The giant, curious to know if the privilege which had been granted him, was a real or imaginary one, drew near the God, and was going to lay his hands on his head, in order to make a trial of his power on the very deity to whom he ow'd it. Rutrem was then ſenſible, but a little too late, of his great overſight in indulging Paimejuran ſo uncommon a favour, and found that his imprudence had brought

brought him into the moſt dreadful, as well as moſt imminent danger to which he had ever been expoſed. To ſecure himſelf from it, requir'd all his cunning, and the great skill he had in magic. 'Twas by the power of this art, which had already been ſo ſerviceable to him on ſeveral occaſions, that he contracted himſelf in an inſtant, ſo as to be able to be ſhut up in the ſhell of a certain fruit, call'd by the Indians Ayvaralicai, which is no bigger than a hazel-nut.

Vixnu was at a great diſtance from the place where this incident happen'd, however he yet got notice of it, when being touch'd with the misfortune which threatned his brother, he ran immediately to free him from it. The better to ſucceed in his attempt, he that moment aſſum'd the ſhape of a woman ſo exquiſitely beautiful, that the giant fell diſtractedly in love with her at firſt ſight, ſo that he thought no more of Rutrem, but left him peaceably in his ſhell. He was now wholly employ'd in contemplating the object which had ſo inchanted him; when after having paid her his moſt profound reſpects, he begg'd her to give him leave to wait upon her home. The lady ſeem'd to accept his compliment with pleaſure, and promiſed even to indulge the utmoſt of his wiſhes, provided that before he went with her home, he would go and waſh his head and his hair in a neighbouring river. The reaſon ſhe gave for requiring this from him, was, that as he had led the life of a penitent for ſeveral years, his hair not having been comb'd, and the birds having often made their neſts, and laid their filth in it, it was grown ſo prodigiouſly dirty, that ſhe could not conſent to his approaches, before it was firſt clean'd. The amorous giant, blinded with paſſion, was not at firſt appriz'd of the ſnare which was laid for him; he therefore went raſhly, and without the leaſt reflection plung'd into the water. He waſh'd his body all over, and going alſo to waſh his hair, in order to pleaſe the lady whoſe beauty had ſo dazled him, he raiſed both his hands upon his head, but ſcarce had he laid them on it, when, by virtue of the fatal power which had juſt been granted him, he was reduced to aſhes in an inſtant.

Vixnu, overjoy'd at the ſucceſs of his ſtratagem, quitted the ſhape of a woman to aſſume his uſual form. He went immediately and told his brother all he had done for his ſake, and in what manner he had annihilated the giant. Rutrem at this good news came out of his ſhell, reſum'd his firſt ſhape, embrac'd his brother, thank'd him for his ſeaſonable aſſiſtance, and made a ſtrong reſolution never to grant any ſuch favours for the future.——But being told all that Vixnu had done, to reſcue him from the danger into which his inconſiderateneſs had brought him, he earneſtly deſir'd to ſee his brother under the ſame form which had inſpir'd the giant with ſo much paſſion. Vixnu cou'd not be prevail'd with for ſome time to gratify Rutrem, and excuſed himſelf by ſaying, that he knew him to be ſo very weak in all affairs wherein love was concern'd, that if he ſhould grant him his requeſt, he would certainly at that very inſtant, be ſo inchanted, and ſo loſt to himſelf, that he would ſcarce have reaſon enough left to guide himſelf with. Rutrem, not contented with theſe reaſons, inſiſted upon being gratified, and preſs'd his brother ſo earneſtly, that Vixnu, to ſatisfy him, reſum'd the female form, and ſtood before Rutrem. At the ſight of this lovely object, the frail God was ſeiz'd with ſuch tranſports, and his imagination was ſo intenſely heated with it, that the ſame inſtant there appear'd a child in the hands of Vixnu, who was call'd Arigara-Putrem, i. e. ſon to Rutrem and Vixnu. Such are the abominable deities which the Indians worſhip, of whom a thouſand obſcene circumſtances are related, which decency will not allow me to mention.

Notwithſtanding that the heathens are divided into a great multitude of different ſects, there are nevertheleſs two which may be look'd upon as the chief; the firſt are thoſe who conſider Vixnu as the greateſt of all the Gods, and theſe are called Vixnuvites; the ſecond are ſuch as preſer Rutrem to him, and theſe are call'd Xiven, becauſe this God goes alſo by that name.

CHAP. XI.

The Notions the Indians have of Paradiſe.

THE Eaſt-Indian idolaters are of opinion, that there are [a] five different places; whither the ſouls of thoſe who have liv'd a holy life upon earth go after death, and enjoy a fulneſs of glory.

The firſt of theſe places is call'd Xoarcam; 'tis there that Devandiren, king of the Gods, reſides with his two wives; one of which is call'd Xachi, and the other Indirani. Beſides theſe, there are five concubines ſurprizingly beautiful, who are continually employ'd in ſerving him. In the ſame place are alſo the three hundred and thirty thouſand millions of Gods, with a much greater number of concubines, where they enjoy all imaginable glory, pleaſure and delight. Forty-eight thouſand penitents ſhare the ſame bliſs in Xoarcam. The Gods cannot undertake any conſiderable affair without firſt conſulting them; nor is there one article, relating to this ſublunary world, treated of in heaven, but what they muſt be firſt acquainted with. However, this glory and all theſe pleaſures don't ſatisfy ſo fully all ſuch as enjoy them, but that they have ſtill a great many things to wiſh for; and the Gods not ſatisfy'd with the eternal delights which are found in Xoarcam, have often envy'd the fleeting happineſs of the inhabitants of the earth, whereof Devandiren is a proof. This ſovereign of the Gods, grown weary of the delights of heaven, reſolv'd to go in ſearch of others in this lower ſphere. He knew that a celebrated penitent, Gaudamen by name, had retir'd to a ſweet ſolitude not far from the Ganges, and that he there led a life of holineſs and tranquillity with his wife, who was one of the moſt beautiful women upon earth. This pretended king of heaven accordingly ſet out from thence, came down upon earth, went to the penitent's hermitage, ſaw his wife, and fell ſo diſtractedly in love with her, that he reſolv'd to uſe his utmoſt endeavours in order to make her violate the fidelity ſhe ow'd her husband. Finding that this charming creature was as virtuous as ſhe was beautiful, he plainly ſaw it would be impoſſible for him ever to ſucceed without calling in artifice to his aſſiſtance. He obſerv'd that Gaudamen never fail'd to riſe every morning at cock-crowing, when he uſed to go and waſh himſelf in the Ganges, which he imagin'd would furniſh him with an eaſy opportunity of ſatisfying his raging paſſion. For this purpoſe, he one night aſſum'd the ſhape of a cock, went and poſted himſelf near the houſe of the penitent, and crow'd, but much earlier than the houſe-cock was uſed to do. At this ſignal, the holy Gaudamen ſtarted up from his ſleep, and notwithſtanding he was very drowſy, he yet, that he might not fail in his morning exerciſe, immediately got up and took his way to the river. Being come to it, he knew by the motion of the water, that it could not be more than midnight, ſo that he imagin'd the cock had not really crow'd, but that he had only fancied he had heard him in his ſleep. Beſides, as the hour in which he uſed to bathe himſelf was not yet near, he reſolv'd to return back home, in order to take a little more reſt. 'Twould be difficult to expreſs how greatly this poor penitent was ſurpriz'd, when he ſaw Devandiren, who had already taken his place, and did not expect his return ſo ſoon, lying in bed by his wife. He was ſo exaſperated at this ungenerous treatment, that without having the leaſt regard to the exalted dignity of the God, he curſed, and vented the moſt dreadful imprecations againſt him; and to puniſh him for his laſciviouſneſs, he wiſh'd that the body of Devandiren might for ever be cover'd with certain marks, which ſhould exactly repreſent repreſent that part which had raiſed his paſſion, and thereby acquaint all who ſhould ſee him with his brutality and infamy. This warm and zealous wiſh had the deſir'd effect; the infortunate God ſaw himſelf reduc'd inſtantaneouſly to ſuch a condition, that he did not dare to ſhow himſelf to any perſon, and was even aſham'd to look upon himſelf. But now he was ſo overwhelm'd with grief at this unhappy accident, that he fell proſtrate at the feet of Gaudamen, beſought him with the utmoſt earneſtneſs to have pity on him, to ſoften the rigour of his torments, that were inflicted on him by the power of his imprecations, and not to ſuffer him to continue in ſo ſhameful and mutilated a condition. The penitent was touch'd with the intreaties and humiliation of the God, and therefore to calm his uneaſineſs, he conſented ſo far, that appearing always to himſelf in the hideous figure he then made, his body ſhould nevertheleſs ſeem to others to be cover'd over with eyes; ſo that this king of the Gods has ever ſince that time been like a ſecond Argus.

[a] In the diſſertation on the Bramins of Coromandel, mention is made of ſeven. The names of theſe places are pretty different.

Gaudamen, not ſatisfy'd with having reveng'd himſelf on Devandiren for the injury he had done him, made his wife alſo feel the effects of his reſentments, who, as a puniſhment of her adultery, tho' involuntarily committed, was, by the power of her huſband's imprecations, chang'd into a ſtone. However it happen'd in proceſs of time, that the God Vixnu having aſſum'd the fleſh under the ſhape of Ram, as was before related, happen'd one day to tread upon that very ſtone; which, upon that, was immediately re-metamorphos'd into the ſame beautiful woman, when ſhe return'd back to her husband, who pardon'd her fault, receiv'd her with pleaſure, and lived with her for ever after in the greateſt harmony and concord.

The ſecond place of glory and felicity is Vaicundam. 'Tis here Vixnu reſides with his wives, and a certain bird very like a hawk, call'd by the Indians, Papangui. Vixnu employs this bird as a horſe, and the Indians have it in ſo much veneration, that whenever they ſee any of them flying in the air, they immedtately alight from their horſes or palankins to ſalute them. They likewiſe believe, that all the devout followers of Vixnu go into Vaicundam after death; and that as fire changes every thing it acts upon into the ſame element, in like manner this God changes into his own ſubſtance, all thoſe who are ſo happy as to be admitted into the heaven where he reſides.

The third manſion of glory is Cailaſam. The heathens ſay, that this is a very high, and wide-extended mountain of ſilver, ſituated towards the north; that 'tis inhabited by Rutrem, his wife Parvardi, and all his concubines, and a certain bull which he makes uſe of for riding. 'Tis here all the followers of Rutrem go after death, whoſe felicity conſiſts in being continually in the preſence of that God, and in doing him one ſervice or other. Some are employ'd in cooling him with great fans; others preſent him with gold ſpitting-boxes, in order that a lord of ſuch diſtinguiſh'd majeſty, may not be oblig'd to ſpit on the ground. There are ſome who hold continually lighted torches in their hands, in order to light him in the night. Others are employ'd in ſuperintending his concubines; of which there are numberleſs multitudes, and to bring to him every day the She he is pleaſed to call for. In fine, each of theſe bleſſed ſouls have a different function in this place, and their felicity conſiſts wholly in doing Rutrem the ſeveral offices he appoints them.

The fourth manſion of glory is call'd Brumalogam, or the world of Bruma; 'tis alſo call'd Satialogam, that is, the world of truth. 'Tis here Bruma generally reſides, with his wife Saraſſuadi; and a large ſwan, which he generally makes uſe of to carry him in his travels.

Melanpadam, i.e. the moſt excellent and higheſt of all places; is the fifth ſeat of glory. 'Tis here the firſt principle, or ſupreme Being reſides; called by the idolaters Parabaravaſtu, that is, the Being by way of eminence, or the moſt excellent of all Beings. 'Tis hither alſo that ſuch as have led irreproachable and exemplary lives upon earth, are waſted after death, where they enjoy ineffable and eternal bliſs; which conſiſts chiefly in enjoying the preſence of this firſt Being for ever; in knowing him, in being intimately united to him, and in becoming hereafter one and the ſame with him. But as there are very few upon earth whoſe lives are perfectly pure and holy, ſo there are not many who have the happineſs to arrive at this ſupreme degree of glory.

CHAP. XII.

The Belief the Indians entertain concerning Hell.

THE idolaters of India believe that hell is not only under the earth which we inhabit, but alſo under the ſeven other worlds beneath ours, whereof mention will be made in the ſequel.

The preſident of hell, whoſe Office it is to ſee the ſentences pronounced by Xiven executed, is called Thamadar-Maraja. He has a ſecretary called Xitragupten, who, during the life of man, takes care to write down faithfully all his good or evil actions; and preſents his memorial to the preſident the very inſtant the ſoul of the deceaſed appears before him. We are aſſured that this infernal director is very juſt and equitable; that he never ſuffers any evil action to go unpuniſhed, or any good one unrewarded; and as there is ſcarce any one, but has done both good and evil in his life-time, he firſt asks every perſon, who is brought before his tribunal, to take his choice, either to be firſt puniſhed for thoſe Faults which he had committed upon earth, and which he did not take care to expiate, in order to his being afterwards rewarded for his good works; or to begin by receiving the recompence due to his virtue, and be afterwards puniſh'd for the crimes he has been guilty of. As ſoon as the dead perſon has made his option, the preſident pronounces; when thoſe who deſir'd to be firſt rewarded for their good Actions, are carried into Zoarcam, or into ſome other of thoſe manſions beforemention'd, there to enjoy felicity and Glory during the time allotted them, at the expiration of which, they are dragg'd into hell, and there puniſh'd for their crimes, during a certain time. But on the other ſide, ſuch as choſe to be firſt puniſh'd in hell, when the time for their chaſtiſement is expir'd, they go and enjoy bliſs and felicity, in that place, and during the time which Thamadar-Maraja had appointed.

After a ſoul has been thus puniſh'd and rewarded according to its merits, it returns back upon earth, and there animates a new body; in ſuch a manner however, that when a poor man has done more evil than good, he, at his ſecond birth, is either poorer than he was before, or elſe animates the body of one of the moſt contemptible animals; but if, on the contrary, his good Actions exceed his evil ones, he then is richer in this new ſtate, than he was before.

If a Bramin in his life-time, has either ſerv'd, or been too familiar with thoſe people call'd Xutres, he then is ſentenc'd to be born ſixteen millions of times, in the mean and moſt contemptible tribe, by way of puniſhment for having acted ſo derogatory to the character of a Bramin. Moreover, the Indians believe that the damned in hell undergo a numberleſs multitude of different torments; and that there are all kinds of ſavage and venomous beaſts, to torture the guilty in that place. Further, the ſouls before they arrive at the palace where the preſident of thoſe gloomy manſions reſides, are oblig'd to ſwim over a river of fire call'd Vaicarany, whoſe courſe is extremely rapid; that 'tis ſometimes a long time before they can reach the ſhore on the other ſide; and that this paſſage is oftentimes more dreadful and more tormenting, than all the puniſhments which are inflicted on the moſt guilty in hell. But in order to ſoften the rigor of the torments which are ſuffer'd in this inevitable paſſage, theſe heathen prieſts give the people to underſtand, that if a ſick man in his expiring moments takes a cow by the tail with his hand, and preſents

it to a Bramin; if afterwards the Bramin puts a little water into the ſick perſon's hand, andthat he immediately pours it on the ground; if laſtly, the ſick perſon, after pouring this water, gives the Bramin a ſum of money by way of alms; and he dies with theſe circumſtances, he then may be aſſur'd, that he will not only have a very quick paſſage over the enflam'd river, but alſo that the fire will not affect him in the leaſt: for he will find the cow which he had given the Bramin on the bank of the river, who will preſent him its tail to hold by, by which means he will croſs to the other ſide without pain or difficulty.

Beſides this firſt preſident, or firſt director of hell, there is alſo a ſecond, call'd Thamen, who not only ſuperintends over all the affairs of this gloomy region, but is alſo king or god of death.

The heathen teachers or doctors aſſure us, that this god himſelf died formerly, and that he afterwards aroſe again, the occaſion of which is as follows.

A famous penitent, Morrugandumagarexi by name, had during a long ſeries of years ſerv'd the Gods with uncommon and moſt exemplary piety. This very virtuous man having no children, was extremely deſirous of having one, and therefore daily beſought the God Xiven, in the moſt earneſt manner, to grant him one. At length the God heard the deſire of the penitent, but before he indulg'd it him, he ask'd him, which he would rather chuſe, either to have ſeveral children who ſhould be long-liv'd and wicked, or to have but one that ſhould be virtuous and prudent, but who ſhould die in his ſixteenth year.

Our penitent, after a little reflection, made choice of the latter; but at the ſame time was very much troubled when he conſider'd how greatly he ſhould be afflicted to loſe in ſo tender an age, a child he had ſo earneſtly deſir'd, and who was to poſſeſs ſo many excellent qualities.

His wife conceiv'd, and was happily deliver'd of the promiſed ſon, whom they named Marcandem. Scarce had he attain'd thoſe years when reaſon begins to enlighten theſoul, but he, like his father, devoted himſelf in the moſt zealous manner to the worſhip of Xiven. He very often offer'd ſacrifices of flowers in his honour, which the Indians call Archinay, and uſed alſo to go frequently in pilgrimage to a famous temple, call'd Tincaddau, dedicated to the ſame God; in which all the heathens in general pay their devotions with a particular zeal and fervour. In fine, no ſooner had this much-lov'd child attain'd his ſixteenth year, but the officers of Thamen, king and god of death, were ſent on the earth to remove him from thence.

Young Marcandem being inform'd on what errand they were come, told them with a reſolute air, that he was reſolv'd not to die, and that they might go back if they pleas'd. The miniſters of the gloomy prince were offended at his refuſal, and thereupon return'd back to their maſter, and told him the whole affair. The king of death hearing that Marcandem refuſed to obey his commands, and was obſtinately reſolved not to die, immediately mounted a great buffle, on which he uſually rode, and ſet out in order to make him a viſit. Being come, he told the youth, That he acted very raſhly in refuſing to leave the world, ſince as Xiven had promiſed him a life only of ſixteen years, and as that term was expir'd, it would be unjuſt in him to refuſe to leave the ſtage. But none of theſe reaſons were able to prevail with Marcandem, who ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution not to die; and fearing leſt the God of death ſhould attempt to take him away by force, he ran to his oratory, and there taking one of thoſe idols call'd Lingam into his hands, he claſp'd it eagerly to his breaſt. In the mean time Thamen being reſolv'd not to have the lye, let what wou'd be the conſequences of it, came down from his buffle, threw a rope about the youth's neck, and held him faſt therewith, as alſo the Lingam, which Marcandem graſp'd with all his ſtrength, and was going to drag them both into hell, when on a ſudden the god Xiven iſſued out of the Lingam, drove back the king of the dead, and gave him ſo furious a blow that he kill'd him on the ſpot, and ſo deliver'd his votary from the impending danger.

The prince of death being thus unfortunately ſlain, mankind were no longer ſubject to his empire, when they multiplied in ſo extraordinary a manner, that the earth was no longer able to contain them. The Gods, who ſaw this confuſion, did not know how to remedy it; ſo at laſt they reſolv'd to go in a body to Xiven, who is the ſame with Rutrem, to ask the reaſon why he had put Thamen to death, who ſeem'd not to have exceeded the limits of his power, ſince Marcandem, whom he had ſummon'd to die, had lived the term of years which had been allotted him. To this Xiven anſwer'd, that when he granted Marcandem a life of ſixteen years, he did not intend thereby that he ſhould die the moment he was come to that period, but only that he ſhould always enjoy the air and vigour of a youth of ſixteen, tho' he were in ever ſo advanc'd an age; that the king of death ought to have enquir'd his intentions in that particular, before he had gone to thoſe extremes; that he had acted very wrong, in attempting to take away Marcandem's life merely by his own authority; but that he was much more to blame, in not reſpecting the Lingam, to whom this young man had fled for protection; that Thamen intended to drag them both into hell, as an illuſtrious inſtance of his power; and that to puniſh Thamen for his raſhneſs, he had thought fit to put him to death.

The Gods heard Xiven's reaſons, and approv'd them; but told him at the ſame time, that he now ſhould be ſatisfied with the vengeance he had taken; that he ought to have ſome regard to the ſtrange diſorder and confuſion which aroſe among mankind, ſince their ceaſing to die; that their number was ſo prodigiouſly increas'd, that the earth was no longer able to contain them; and that as the only remedy left, was to reſtore the god of death to life, they therefore beſought him to do it from the above-mention'd conſiderations. Xiven yielded to the preſſing inſtances of the reſt of the Gods, and to the reaſons they gave; and accordingly reſtor'd Thamen to life, and to all the rights and privileges he had before enjoy'd.

The prince of the dead being thus reſtor'd to his former condition, immediately diſpatch'd a herald to all parts of the world, who ſummon'd all the old men to ſubmit immediately to death. The herald got drunk before he ſet out, and without ſtaying till the fumes of the wine were diſpell'd, mounted an elephant, and rode up and down the world purſuant to his commiſſion. Before him went a great number of trumpets and kettle-drums, that mankind might be more attentive to his proclamation. But as he was not yet quite ſober, he, inſtead of publiſhing the order in the very terms he had receiv'd it, declar'd with a loud voice, that it was the will and pleaſure of Thamen king of death and one of the preſidents of hell, that from this day forward, all the [a]leaves, flowers and fruits, whether ripe or green, ſhould fall to the ground. This proclamation was no ſooner iſſued out, than mankind began to yield to death, but with this difference, that before Thamen was kill'd, none were depriv'd of life but thoſe only who were of a very advanc'd age; whereas now people of all ages ſubmit to the fatal ſtroke, not excepting children ſucking at the breaſt, and others yet unborn.

Such was the force of the king of death's command, notwithſtanding 'twas iſſued out in that inadvertent manner, ſo oppoſite to the intentions of that gloomy monarch, and quite otherwiſe than he had enjoin'd.

Thamen, in conjunction with Thamadar-Maraja, not only appoints the various torments in hell which are to be inflicted on each individual, but often executes the ſentence which he himſelf has pronounced. Yet how rigorous ſoever the torments may be which are inflicted on the guilty, they have at leaſt this conſolation, viz. that they know they are to laſt but a limited time. This certainty and aſſurance, that a period will one day be put to their torments, is the chief cauſe why the Indians abandon themſelves, with ſo little remorſe, to every kind of obſcenity, and the moſt horrid actions.

[a] This is a metaphorical way of expreſſion, and ſignifies people of all ages, and even children unborn.

CHAP. XIII.

The Notions the Indians have of the human Soul.

THE Indian idolaters are unanimouſly agreed, that man has a principle of life within him, by whoſe power he acts and moves, and this they call the ſoul: but they differ very much with reſpect to the idea they entertain of this principle; and are divided into a numberleſs multitude of opinions on this head, all which are very contradictory to each other. Some of theſe aſſert, that man has two ſouls, which are entirely diſtinct from each other, one whereof they pretend to be vegetative, and the other intelligent. They affirm, that the firſt is univerſally infuſed into all beings that have life, whether they are indued with ſenſation or not; and that this ſoul diffuſes itſelf into each of theſe beings, but without being multiplied. 'Tis with regard to this firſt ſoul, that thoſe who give into this opinion admit the doctrine of tranſmigration. As for the other ſoul which they affirm alſo to be in man, ſome of their doctors pretend that 'tis God himſelf, who animates man with his own eſſence. Others, of whom there are great numbers, have a notion that not only men, but animals, are animated with the ſubſtance of God; that in conſequence of this, we are to look upon them both as indued with reaſon; ſo that the difference which is obſerv'd between mankind and animals, is entirely owing to the different manner in which the ſoul performs its operations with regard to the different conſtructions of the organs. Some ſay that man only is indued with reaſon; and that the beaſts act by inſtinct; however 'tis expreſſly taught in the Vedam, i. e. the very true law and doctrine, that God is not only the ſoul of all ſenſible beings, but that he alſo animates ſuch as are depriv'd of all ſenſation, not excepting the very elements. Some of theſe doctors maintain, that the ſoul of man is not formally and ſubſtantially God, and that 'tis only an emanation, a ſpark, or ray of the Divinity. Others teach, that God created all ſouls in general, whether of men or brutes, at the ſame inſtant; and that theſe are continually and ſucceſſively paſſing from one body into another. Some among them believe, that the ſoul is not created by God, but that the parents contribute no leſs to its formation, than to that of the body which it animates; and theſe, by a conſequence very juſtly drawn from this falſe principle, believe that the ſoul and body are equally mortal and corruptible. In fine, thoſe who hold that there are two ſouls in man, are of opinion, that the vegetative only, after its ſeparation from the body, is waſted to the tribunal of Tamadar-Maraja and of Thamen, and is ſubject to their empire. Theſe are the opinions which prevail moſt univerſally among the heathen Indians on this head.

CHAP. XIV.

The Notions the Heathens have of the World, and the Time it is to endure.

ALL the heathens in India believe unanimouſly, and aſſert that there are fourteen worlds, ſeven of which are ſituated beneath our earth, and that the other ſeven are placed above it. They all agree likewiſe in the degree and order in which each of theſe worlds is placed.

Hell, ſay they, is the loweſt of all. That which is immediately above it is call'd Magadel; after which is Taladalem; above that is Rajadalem, viz, the world of mercury mercury or quick-ſilver, which they alſo ſay is the world of ſerpents. Next is Sudalam, above which is Vidalam. Between this laſt and that which we inhabit, is the world call'd Adelam, over which our earth is placed; where, according to the Indians, are ſeven ſeas. The firſt is of ſalt water; the ſecond of ſugar boil'd to a perfectly beautiful ſyrup; the third is of palm wine, call'd by the Indians, Tari; the fourth is of butter; the fifth of curdled milk; the ſixth is of milk, and 'tis here Vixnu often chuſes to reſide, reclin'd on an adder of perfect beauty, whoſe five heads ſerve Vixnu for an umbrello or canopy. In fine, the ſeventh of theſe ſeas is of a very clear and ſweet cryſtalline water. Over our earth is the world of air, on which the Xoarcam is ſeated, where all thoſe, who during this mortal life have offer'd ſacrifices to the Gods, enjoy all imaginable pleaſures, in the company of a numberleſs multitude of very beautiful concubines. Tho' Devandiren, king of the Gods, ſometimes reſides in Xoarcam, he yet commonly keeps his court in a region that is ſtill higher, call'd Magologam, i. e. wide-extended world, together with the three hundred and thirty thouſand millions of Gods, who are divided into two claſſes. Some of theſe are real Gods, but the reſt are mighty giants; and theſe two orders are almoſt continually at war with each other. Above Magologam is Genagolam, or the world of nations; here we meet with people of all tribes and conditions. After this is Tabalogam, or the world of penitents; this region is inhabited by ſuch as have led auſtere and mortified lives upon earth. In fine, the name of the higheſt world is Lattiologam, or the world of truth; 'tis here Bruma reſides, with thoſe, who during their life-time ſerv'd him in a devout manner: theſe, after their death, and even often in their life-time, are ſo perfectly transform'd into the real ſubſtance of that God, as to make but one and the ſame with him.

The Bramins inſinuate to the people, that if one of their tribe happens, during his life in this world, to cut the ſtring or thread with which the members of this Caſte uſually gird themſelves, in order to diſtinguiſh themſelves from all other tribes, or abſtains from wearing it; if he afterwards cauſes to cut off the little tuſt of hair, which the members of that Caſte only are allow'd to wear, and which alſo is a mark of diſtinction; laſtly, if after having thus voluntarily ſtript himſelf of theſe badges of nobility, and of the tribe he belongs to, he diſcovers an inclination to embrace a life of penance, he then muſt take in his right-hand a bamboo ſtick, a kind of cane, which muſt have ten, twelve, or fourteen joints in it. He muſt alſo carry a great cup of earth or copper in his left-hand, to ſerve him for eating and drinking. He muſt likewiſe cover himſelf from the waiſt to the knees, with a piece of cloth ſtriped with ſeveral colours, and heighten the whole with theſe words, Agame Bruma, i. e. I am truly the God Bruma. Then, by virtue of theſe myſterious words, the Bramin is that inſtant chang'd and transform'd into the real ſubſtance of this God; whereupon all thoſe of the ſame tribe who are preſent, immediately fall proſtrate on the earth, and worſhip him as being really and truly a God. The Bramnates, who are the wives of the tribe of the Bramins, but eſpecially their widows, immediately appoint and celebrate feſtivals in honour of the new God, and have alſo their watchings and nocturnal feaſts, to teſtify the zeal and veneration they have for him.

The Bramins who are thus deified, ſcarce eat of any thing but what theſe female devotees have prepar'd for them in the night-time. Theſe, tho' they are reputed to be the moſt virtuous and moſt chaſte women among the Indians, are in reality the moſt laſcivious and moſt abominable. We are told that they are very skilful in magic, and employ that infernal art in order to obtain their obſcene wiſhes. In fine, the Indians believe that whenever theſe metamorphoſed Bramins die, they are immediately wafted into the world where Bruma reſides, to be never ſeparated from him more.

The heathen Indians believe, that the fourteen worlds above-mention'd ſupport one another, and that they are all ſupported by an high mountain of very pure gold, call'd Magameru-Parruvadam, or, the mountain of a prodigious height and extent; that this mountain is ſupported by eight elephants; that a tortoiſe bears up all theſe elephants; and laſtly, that one of thoſe adders call'd Sexen or Nallé Pambou, ſupports this tortoiſe. If one asks them what ſupports the adder, they anſwer they cannot tell, and have no more to ſay for themſelves. The books in which their law is contain'd, teach alſo that [a] earthquakes are cauſed by the adder's moving itſelf, when being weary of continuing in one poſture, it turns about, in order to get ſome eaſe from the pain cauſed by the immenſe weight of the mountain, with which it is rather oppreſs'dthan loaded. The ſame adder, which the Indians worſhip as a very powerful deity, is alſo thought to cauſe eclipſes. But before I mention the manner in which the heathens think they happen, we muſt obſerve, that they admit of twelve celeſtial ſigns; that they reckon twenty-ſeven fix'd ſtars, to each of which they give a particular name, which I forbear enumerating, in order not to fatigue the reader by ſo great a number of barbarous and uncouth names. They likewiſe pretend that the ſun is ſix hundred and five thouſand leagues above the earth, and that the moon is at the like diſtance under the ſun. So that being unable to comprehend how the eclipſes are really form'd, and to give the true reaſons thereof, they have invented theſe following.

CHAP. XV.

The Notions the Indians have how Eclipſes are form'd.

THE reader may have obſerv'd at the beginning of this treatiſe, how the Gods, in ſpight of all the oppoſition made by the giants, had at laſt drawn off the butter from the ſea of milk; and in what manner Vixnu having amus'd the latter, till ſuch time as the Gods had carried off the butter, diſappear'd on a ſudden, and left the giants in great conſternation, and in the deepeſt affliction to find themſelves thus depriv'd of the ſhare they thought to have of this delicious repaſt. We are likewiſe to know, that Vixnu, after this expedition, prepar'd a great banquet to which all the Gods were invited. This feaſt was heightned with a vaſt variety of exquiſite viands, and a prodigious quantity of butter, which had been got for each gueſt in particular. Now it happen'd that the adder Sexen, a conſiderable deity, who had been very aſſiſting in getting this butter, happen'd, for a reaſon which I am not acquainted with, to come a little later than the reſt. Being all ſet at table, they put by a portion for the adder; but the ſun and moon, who are the gluttonous, as well as the brighteſt of all the Gods, took the adder's ſhare, and ſwallow'd it down, after they had eat their own. The adder afterwards coming in, and hearing what had happen'd, was highly enrag'd at their uncivil treatment; ſhe fell into a violent paſſion, ſwore ſhe would make thoſe who had put this affront upon her repent of it; and proteſted, that to puniſh them for their gluttony, and the little reſpect they had ſhew'd her, ſhe would find an opportunity of ſwallowing them both, and at a time when they ſhould leaſt ſuſpect it. Nor were theſe mere threats, for the adder has often been as good as her word; and that which we call an eclipſe of the ſun or moon, happens, according to the Indians, whenever Sexen is going to ſwallow one or both thoſe planets. But ſince the world would be for ever depriv'd of light, and conſequently be wrap'd in endleſs darkneſs, in caſe thoſe two luminous bodies ſhould ever happen to be quite devour'd; no ſooner does the adder ruſh upon either of them, and begins to ſwallow it, but all the Gods run and endeavour to pacify it; while all the heathens, on their ſide, plunge into the water, humble themſelves, fall proſtrate before the adder, and addreſs it in fervent prayers; beſeeching it to deliver one or other of thoſe planets who poſſibly may be in danger. Theſe prayers are accompanied with a flood of tears, and a moſt dreadful hurly-burly, which which continues till ſuch time as the adder being mov'd to compaſſion, by the prodigious cries and numberleſs prayers which are made to it, lets go its hold, and releaſes the planet. The heathens don't content themſelves with praying, bathing, weeping and crying as loud as ever they can baul, but abſtain alſo from eating, drinking or ſleeping; they neither boil or roaſt any thing, or keep any kind of food in their houſes, while the eclipſe laſts; laſtly, they pretend that 'tis at an end, when the adder indulges their earneſt requeſt, by ſpewing up the planet which it had already begun to devour.

Of all the errors which the idolaters give into, there are none with which they are more univerſally infatuated, or which it would be more difficult to root out, than thoſe which relate to eclipſes, and the duration of ages, whereof mention will be made in the following chapter.

CHAP. XVI.

The Opinion of the Indians with regard to Time, and of the Duration of Ages.

ALL the heathen Indians believe, that the time this world is to endure is divided into four ages, or parts, which they call Guirraduyagam, Duabrayagam, Tirredayagam, and Calyagam. Three of theſe four ages, ſay they, are already paſt, and were really ſo many ages of gold, not only becauſe of the prodigious length of man's life, but alſo from the great happineſs and tranquillity which mankind in thoſe times enjoy'd. 'Twas in the third age that a certain king, father to Ram, liv'd, of whom mention was made in the hiſtory of Vixnu; this monarch, after having liv'd ſeventy thouſand years without iſſue, was at laſt ſo happy as to have a great many children afterwards, notwithſtanding his extreme old age.

The fourth age of the world, call'd Calyagam, which we are now in, is, according to theſe heathens, a truly iron-age, as well with regard to the afflictions and misfortunes with which mankind are almoſt oppreſs'd, as in conſideration of the ſhortneſs of their lives. Of this iron-age, forty-eight thouſand, four hundred, forty-eight years, according to their computation, are already paſt; and it will, according to them, laſt much longer, ſince the time paſt compar'd with that which is to come, is no more than a grain of muſtard-ſeed in compariſon of a large gourd.

The heathens, who thus far are univerſally agreed with regard to this fabulous diſtinction of times, are divided with reſpect to the reſt, into two very oppoſite opinions; one part imagining that when this iron-age ſhall be completed, the world will alſo end; and the other on the contrary aſſerting, that after this age of iron, the golden ages which preceded it ſhall begin again, and will thus follow one another ſucceſſively, ſo that the world will be of eternal duration.

Theſe idolaters have a certain book, call'd Andaxacaram, in which it is written, that beſides the four ages above-mention'd, there were fourteen others which preceded them, making eighteen in all. Each of theſe ages has its diſtinct name, but as they are too harſh and barbarous, I ſhall not mention them, and ſhall only take notice of the prodigious duration which the Indians aſcribe to theſe pretended and imaginary ages. They ſay, that the firſt age laſted an hundred and forty millions of years; the ſecond, an hundred and thirty millions; the third, an hundred and twenty; the fourth, an hundred and ten; the fifth, an hundred millions; the ſixth, ninety; the ſeventh, eighty; the eighth, ſeventy; the ninth, ſixty millions; the tenth, fifty; the eleventh, forty; the twelfth, thirty millions; the thirteenth, twenty; the fourteenth, ten; the fifteenth, fifteenth, nine millions ſixty thouſand; the ſixteenth, ſeven millions five hundred thouſand; the ſeventeenth, five millions and nine hundred thouſand; and laſtly, the eighteenth, four millions, four hundred thouſand, three hundred years: ſo that this chimerical computation of the duration of the world amounts to 1,076,960,300 years.

To this fiction they add another which is full as ridiculous, which is, their aſſerting that the planets are not only living and rational Beings, but that they alſo are Gods, and have wives and children. Here follows the notion they have of the creation of man.

CHAP. XVII.

The Notions the Indians have of Man.

WE obſerv'd in the third chapter, that all the heathen Indians are firmly perſuaded, and look upon it as an undoubted truth, that all men in general came originally from the God Bruma; that ſome iſſued from his face, as the Bramins, whoſe tribe is ſubdivided into a numberleſs multitude of degrees and ſects, moſt of whom differ in opinion. That others, as the Rajas, came out of the ſhoulders of the ſame God, and theſe, like the Bramins, are ſubdivided into a prodigious number of kinds. That the Comates ſprang from Bruma's thighs, who are alſo divided into ſeveral ſects; and laſtly, that from the feet of the ſame God the Xutres iſſued, the meaneſt and moſt numerous of all the tribes, which is divided into more branches than all the reſt.

Beſides theſe four principal tribes or Caſtes, which deſcended originally from the God Bruma, he alſo is the principle of a fifth very numerous one, which however has ſo little relation or affinity with the four above-mention'd, that the members of it ſeem to be a particular ſpecies of men. The members of this fifth tribe are all call'd by the general name of Niger or Xandalam. Theſe are divided into four branches; thoſe of the firſt are call'd Archivarata; the ſecond Pallas; the third Pareas, and the fourth and laſt Alparqueiros.

All the ſuperior tribes look upon that of Xandalam with contempt; and conſider them as a ſett of infamous wretches. The eating with them, or even the ſeeing them eat or drink, is not only look'd upon as mean, but is even thought to be an enormous and unpardonable crime. The members of the firſt four tribes believe that 'tis not lawful, on any occaſion whatever, or in how great danger ſoever they may be, to ſuffer any of theſe unhappy Nigers to enter their houſes; or to receive any thing from their hands, not even a drop of water tho' they were juſt dying with thirſt. This ſevere law is obſerv'd ſo exactly, that any one who infringes it, is not only puniſh'd with death, but his whole poſterity is for ever depriv'd of the privileges of their tribe; is rank'd among the Nigers, and never after reſtor'd to its former rank.

The poor Xandalams are had in ſuch univerſal contempt, that they are oblig'd to ſequeſter themſelves from the reſt of the world. They never dare come near a city, or any other place inhabited by thoſe of the firſt four tribes, but live in the woods and fields, where they till the ground, and ſubſiſt chiefly by fiſhing and hunting.

Such among the heathens as make ſtudy their occupation, are call'd Xaſtres, as alſo the Saniaſes, who have embrac'd a life of penance and devotion, wou'd think the bare ſpeaking to one of the above-mention'd moſt abominable tribe, a moſt horrid ſin. If a Niger ſhould happen to touch a pot, or any other copper or earthen veſſel which the members of the other tribes make uſe of in their kitchins, or for keeping water; the owner of thoſe veſſels cannot abſolutely make any further uſe of them; and whether they be empty or full of what thing ſoever, is indiſpenſably oblig'd, either to break, or to give them to the perſon whoſe bare touch had made unclean. Butthe moſt ſtrange and ſurprizing circumſtance of all, is, that the members of the above-mention'd tribe are not ſuffer'd to enter the temples, or even ſo much as to come near them, either to pray, or offer up their gifts to the Gods. Nor are they allow'd to draw any water, either for drinking or waſhing themſelves with, out of the wells which the other Caſtes make uſe of. All the reſt of the heathens have theſe wretched Nigers in ſo much abhorrence, that tho' it were impoſſible for them, when ſeiz'd with a moſt dangerous and deſperate fit of ſickneſs, to have relief from any other perſon, they wou'd rather die, than ſuffer a Niger to give them any. In fine, this laſt tribe is had in inexpreſſible contempt and averſion all India over.

Some heathen doctors maintain, that of the five tribes above-mention'd, thoſe of the firſt only, viz. the Bramins, are really endued with ſouls. Others, as was before obſerv'd, differ ſo much from them in opinion, that they believe, that mankind in general are animated by one ſoul. However, notwithſtanding the prodigious diſparity of ſentiments which prevails among them, they are all unanimous with regard to the belief of the tranſmigration of ſouls. This doctrine, ſo famous among the heathens in all ages, and almoſt all nations, is by the Indians thought to be ſo clear and ſelf-evident, that they cannot poſſibly conceive how there ſhould be any in the world ſo void of reaſon as to doubt the truth of it. Here follows the principal arguments which the moſt learned among them employ againſt ſuch as diſpute the truth of it. No one, ſay they, can deny, but that the evils with which men are afflicted in this world, are ordain'd by the Gods for the puniſhment of the ſins they may have committed; and that the bleſſings which are ſhower'd down on others, are alſo ſent by the ſame Gods as the reward of their virtue. If this be ſo, which they look upon as indiſputable, whence is it that ſo many people who are known to have been never guilty of any crime, but have led irreproachable and exemplary lives; and that ſo many children, who are incapable of ſinning, ſhould nevertheleſs be ſubject to ſo great a variety of miſeries and diſeaſes? whence is it on the contrary, that ſuch a multitude of others who are flagrantly infamous and wicked, do nevertheleſs enjoy health and an uninterrupted ſeries of proſperity? 'Tis certain that the happineſs of the latter, is beſtow'd as a reward for the virtues they had practis'd in the foregoing generations, and that the troubles with which the former are oppreſs'd, are inflicted as a puniſhment for the crimes they had been guilty of, when they animated other bodies; becauſe otherwiſe, we muſt neceſſarily accuſe providence of injuſtice, in treating the virtuous ſo ill, and the wicked ſo well. From this argument, which they look upon as unanſwerable, they conclude the certainty of the tranſmigration of ſouls. We ſhall afterwards take notice of the motives, which induced thoſe idolaters to be ſo tenacious of this doctrine.

CHAP. XVIII.

That moſt Articles in the Heathen Doctrine, bear ſome affinity to that of the Chriſtians.

SUCH as reflect ſeriouſly on the principal points of the doctrine of the heathen Indians, will ſoon be of opinion, that theſe idolaters were formerly acquainted with the * myſteries of the chriſtian religion; and that the truths which were undoubtedly deliver'd to them, have been inſenſibly chang'd for want of evangelical preachers, who might continue to explain them to the people. 'Tis very probable that theſe Indians, who are naturally ſuperſtitious and addicted to the worſhip of idols, have inſenſibly aban-

don'd the doctrine they had receiv'd, to follow the falſe ideas which a depraved imagination ſuggeſted; inſomuch that their whole religion at this day, is made up of ſuch a texture of ridiculous ſtories and fictions, that 'tis almoſt incredible to imagine how men endued with reaſon can poſſibly give credit to them.

As for inſtance, we manifeſtly perceive an idea, tho' a very groſs and imperfect one, of the incomprehenſible myſtery of the ever-bleſſed Trinity, in the fabulous hiſtory of their Gods, when they ſay that from Vixnu, whom they call Adevixnu, or Vixnu the firſt principle, proceeds Bruma, which ſignifies knowledge, whom they affirm to be ſon to the firſt principle, but born without a mother; and that afterwards in one of their books, call'd Chitanandi, they make Rutrem to be as aſſociate to theſe two firſt Deities; and laſtly, in like manner as the chriſtian doctrine aſſures that God created all things by his WORD, they alſo teach, that all things viſible and inviſible were made by Bruma, whom they call the knowledge of God, or, the God who knows all things.

Theſe have ſubſtituted the doctrine of tranſmigration inſtead of the reſurrection, by which means the good are rewarded and the wicked puniſh'd. We likewiſe find, that they have ſome knowledge of original ſin, ſince they teach, that diſeaſes, fatigues, adverſities, and death itſelf, are inflicted as puniſhments for crimes committed in former generations; and are thus in ſome meaſure ſenſible, and allow of that which St. Paul teaches, viz. that ſin is the fatal ſource of all our evils and of death. If we who profeſs the religion of Chriſt Jeſus, believe that ſins are remitted by virtue of the bleſſed ſacrament, and principally by baptiſm and penance; the heathens, by the inſtigation of the devil, who endeavours to mimic the true God, teach, that they are cleanſed from their ſins by only waſhing themſelves in the rivers of Caxi, Ramejuran, Cavery, the Ganges, of Cambuconam, or in other waters, which, according to them, have the ſingular property of purifying the conſciences of men. But 'tis not only in plunging themſelves in theſe waters, which they fancy to be of ſo ſalutary a quality, as to cleanſe them from all impurities; they believe alſo that the ſacrifices which they offer to their Gods, have the ſame effect. They even think that the bare invoking them, immediately reſtores to grace: and not ſatisfied with this, they have carried their ſuperſtition to that length, as to aſſure, that ſuch as once zealouſly invoke the name of Ram, who is the ſame with Vixnu made fleſh, immediately obtain a remiſſion of all their ſins; that if they repeat it a ſecond time, they thereby acquire ſo much merit, as to reduce the Gods to a kind of inability of rewarding them according to their deſerts. They aſcribe the ſame merit to the names of Xiven, of Chrixnen, of Velayadam, and ſeveral others, which they repeat inceſſantly, in order to expiate their ſins at ſo eaſy a rate.

The heathens, beſides theſe various methods of obtaining a forgiveneſs of their ſins, perform ſeveral ſacrifices to appeaſe the wrath of the Gods, and thereby obtain a kind of indulgence. Some of theſe are bloody ſacrifices, and go by the name of Belly, and others call'd Rigei, in which no blood is ſpilt; ſome conſiſt only in offering flowers, and theſe they call Archiney; and laſtly, there are others again call'd Oman. Theſe heathens aſcribe a very great virtue to theſe four kinds of ſacrifices, and alſo to a kind of chaplet of beads, which they uſe in ſaying their prayers.

Theſe chaplets, the beads whereof are made of a certain fruit call'd Rutraxam, and which are uſed by moſt of the followers of Xiven, are thought to have a wonderful efficacy in them. Some of theſe beads have not one ſtreak, others have one; there are ſome that have three, four, and others again many more. The Indians call the ſmooth ſpaces, which are between theſe ſtreaks, faces or viſages; and the more ſtreaks, and conſequently the more faces any of theſe beads have, the more they value them; they ſuppoſing the more faces a bead has, the greater is its virtue, and the greater the merit of the perſon who uſes it in praying.

The

The Rutraxams, or beads without one ſtreak, and which being quite ſmooth, have conſequently but one face, are of ſo excellent a nature, and ſo very meritorious to the owner, that tho' he ſhould have kill'd a Bramin, or a cow, which are look'd upon by theſe heathens as capital crimes, are not only pardon'd, but become as holy and perfect as Xiven himſelf. Beads with two faces have the ſame effect; thoſe with three contain the emblem of fire, and have the virtue of purifying and reſtoring a man to innocence, tho' he ſhould have kill'd his wife. Beads with four faces, purify a man who has kill'd ſeveral Bramins, notwithſtanding their being of the ſame ſubſtance with the God Bruma; becauſe Xiven, who is the ſame with Rutrem, made uſe of the ſame fruit to expiate his ſin in cutting off Bruma's head, when he liv'd in a ſcandalous manner with his own daughter, as has been already related in chap. viii. The beads with five faces, have the privilege to blot out all kinds of ſin, and likewiſe preſerve all ſuch as poſſeſs them, from Thamen king of the dead, ſo that he has not the power of annoying them; but yet this wonderful fruit does not preſerve them who have the greateſt ſtock of it, from dying like the reſt of their fellow-creatures. The Rutraxams with ſix faces, have the ſame virtues as thoſe of two, three, or ſeven faces, and have likewiſe the power of reſtoring him to innocence, who ſhould have committed inceſt with his own daughter. They have, beſides this wonderful privilege, the virtue of preſerving all ſuch as carry them about them, from being bit by adders of any kind. The beads with eight faces, cleanſe the perſon who has them about him from all ſin he may have committed, in ſeducing the wife of his ghoſtly father, nay tho' he ſhould have long continued in a ſtate of adultery with her. The beads with nine faces reſtore a man to innocence, tho' he ſhould have kill'd or aſſaſſinated a million of Bramins; and he, who wears them tyed to his right-arm all his life-time, may depend upon being predeſtinated; and that tho' he does not perform one good action, he yet will enjoy equal glory after this life with the God Xiven.

He who is ſo fortunate as to wear a chaplet whoſe beads have ten faces, may depend upon a general abſolution from all his ſins, how great and enormous ſoever they may be, and that he ſhall never be hurt either by man, or by venomous beaſts, or devils. The beads with eleven faces procure the poſſeſſor, both in this world and the next, the ſame glory and felicity as Xiven enjoys. Such as carry about them chaplets made of beads with twelve faces, become bright and reſplendent as the ſun, and partake of all the prayers and ſacrifices which are offer'd up to the Gods in all parts of the earth. In fine, as no one has yet ſeen any of thoſe miraculous fruits with more than thirteen faces, ſuch as are happy enough to meet with any of that kind, which are equally rare and precious, and wear them fix'd to their arms or their necks, are thereby endued with ſo ſurprizing an agility, that they may convey themſelves inſtantaneouſly from one place to another, tho' ever ſo far diſtant. The owners of theſe have likewiſe the glorious privilege, of committing the moſt obſcene and moſt inceſtuous actions with impunity; and to complete the extravagance, the infamous heathen doctors teach, that the more of theſe beads a man carries about him, the greater is his merit: ſo that thoſe who have the wonderful good fortune to get a thouſand of them, arrive at ſo ſupreme a degree of honour and felicity, that nothing they do can poſſibly be criminal; and therefore may, without the leaſt remorſe, or danger of polluting themſelves, commit the moſt flagrant and abominable crimes. So that thoſe things which the Bramins propoſe as proper to drive away and expiate ſin, have juſt the contrary effect, becauſe of the hopes which theſe deluded people entertain that none will be imputed to them.

CHAP. XIX.

Continuation of the foregoing Subject.

'TIS not to be doubted, but the heathens have had ſome knowledge of the fall of Lucifer and the reſt of the apoſtate angels, ſince their books relate, that there was anciently a great diviſion among the Gods; that ſome fell under the diſpleaſure of their ſovereign for having dar'd to rebel againſt him; that to puniſh them, they were depriv'd of the happineſs they before enjoy'd, and thereupon fell into a ſtate of miſery, ſince which they have been wholly employ'd in doing all the miſchief they poſſibly can to mankind; and that they are now call'd Raxader, which in our language ſignifies devil.

As to the flood, 'tis plain they were not wholly unacquainted with the hiſtory of it, ſince we find it related in the above-mention'd books, that there was formerly an antient man, Tirruvalluven by name, who being one day at dinner with his daughter, in a great wicker-basket lin'd with a buffle's-hide, a prodigious rain fell, which laſted ſo long, that it overflow'd the whole earth; that mankind were then univerſally deſtroy'd, the good old man and his daughter excepted, whom the Gods, by a peculiar providence, preſerv'd from the general inundation; that when the waters were withdrawn, and the earth was grown dry, the man came out from his basket, and notwithſtanding his advanced age, had ſeveral children by his daughter; and that 'twas in this manner mankind was then reſtor'd, and the earth repeopled.

We alſo meet in the ſame books with a groteſque deſcription of the combats between David and Sampſon, in that part of the hiſtory of the Gods, where the wars which Ram waged againſt the giants are related. The account they give of them is ſo ſurprizingly whimſical, that we have thought proper to inſert ſome particulars of it in this place.

The heathen doctors, who, as was already obſerv'd, are divided into a numberleſs multitude of ſects and opinions, are nevertheleſs unanimouſly agreed in their belief of the fabulous hiſtories of their Gods; and pay as much veneration to theſe kind of hiſtories, as we (pardon the compariſon) do to the goſpel. Moſt of theſe wretched prieſts ſpend a conſiderable part of their lives in ſtudying, and afterwards teaching them to others. They repeat them in their pagods, in houſes, in public places of reſort, and oftentimes in the open fields, and are always follow'd by a great croud of people.

The reaſon why they ſo aſſiduouſly publiſh theſe kind of fictions, is, becauſe it gains them the eſteem of the vulgar, and eſpecially of the women, not to mention the plentiful alms it procures them, with which they ſupport their families; and on the other ſide, that which inclines the populace to liſten to them ſo eagerly, is, the Bramins aſſuring them, that all ſuch as have a perfect knowledge of theſe myſteries, and aſſiſt with reſpect and attention, to what is related to them on that ſubject, render themſelves worthy of all kinds of bleſſings, that they are cheriſhed by the Gods, preſerv'd from all dangers, and even become invulnerable; that all their ſins are forgiven, that they ſhall ſee the face of Bruma; ſhall one day have the happineſs of reſembling him exactly; that like Ram they ſhall acquire a perfect knowledge of all things; and laſtly, that they ſhall be very skilful in fencing, in which they aſſure this God excels.

They relate, that when Ram was but twelve years of age, he alone kill'd a giant of a prodigious ſtature; that when he had attain'd the age fit for marriage, he took Sidi to wife; that he uſed to draw a bow of ſuch extraordinary weight, that ſixty thouſand men could hardly lift it from the ground; that not long after his marriage, he reſolv'd to travel round the world, after which he voluntarily confin'd himſelf to a deſart; there he he employ'd himſelf in viſiting the penitents and religious, to whom he granted ſeveral great privileges, and even ſent ſome of them to heaven, there to enjoy glory and felicity. 'Twas while Ram was thus employing himſelf in the exerciſes of a ſolitary life, that the famous Ravanen appear'd under the diſguiſe of a penitent, and carried off his wife Sidi, and waſted her into the iſland of Ceylan. No ſooner had this impious giant withdrawn himſelf with his prey, but he began to perſecute all good people, and was even ſo bold as to attack the Gods, againſt whom he declar'd war, and cut out a great deal of work for them during a long ſeries of time. He was very skilful in all military exerciſes, and having been brought up under the protection of Bruma, had been diſtinguiſh'd by ſeveral extraordinary marks of his favour. This God had, among other things, preſented him with a ſett of very excellent offenſive and defenſive weapons, which had enabled him to come off victorious in a thouſand different engagements. Bruma had alſo favour'd him ſo far, that he excell'd in every kind of knowledge; and ſo great was his ſtrength, that he overcame the eight elephants on whoſe backs the world is ſupported.

'Twas after ſo unexpected a victory that he undertook to attack Devandiren king of the Gods, and oblig'd him to come, with all the other Gods, twice every day to do him homage in his palace. But this not ſatisfying him, he reſolv'd to drive Xiven alſo from the glorious manſion where he generally reſides. But here his good fortune began to fail him; for this God puſhing him with his hand, threw him down, when the giant was ſo ſqueez'd between the ground and Xiven's fingers, as almoſt ſtifled him to death. To extricate himſelf from this danger, he ſtole away one of his arms, and having chang'd one of his two heads into a guittar, touch'd this new inſtrument ſo finely, that the God, inchanted with the harmonious ſounds, not only gave him his liberty without doing him the leaſt harm, but likewiſe granted him ſeveral new privileges, the chief of which were, the obtaining a life of thirty millions of years, and the having an army compoſed of an hundred millions of giants, ſome of whom ſhould have fifty heads; and others were to be endued with ſuch prodigious ſtrength, that when they ſtruck the ſea with their foot, it ſhould make the waters of it retire in ſuch a manner as to diſcover the bottom.

As for Ravanen, he was ſo huge a monſter, that he had twenty ſhoulders and the ſame number of arms; and the breadth of each of theſe ſhoulders to that which was oppoſite to it was thirty leagues. There was alſo a veſſel full of a certain heavenly liquor lodg'd in his ſtomach, which he was oblig'd, for his own ſake, to preſerve with the utmoſt care; becauſe, that tho' a life of thirty millions of years had been granted him, 'twas nevertheleſs with this proviſo, that the precious liquor contain'd in this veſſel ſhould not be ſpilt; and that in caſe the veſſel ſhould be broke before the expiration of that term, he was to die the ſame inſtant. This dreadful giant had not only ten heads, but what is ſtill more wonderful, no ſooner was one cut off, but another immediately ſprung up in its place. Nevertheleſs all theſe glorious prerogatives could not preſerve him from falling at laſt a victim to the power of Ram, which happen'd as follows.

After that Ravanen, in the diſguiſe of a penitent, had carried off Sidi, Ram not knowing what was become of her, was greatly troubled to loſe his wife in this manner. He did his utmoſt endeavours for a long time to get ſome information where ſhe was, but all to no purpoſe. At length he addreſs'd himſelf to Innuman, who is the ape-god, or ſovereign of all the apes, ſon to the wind, and endued with ſuch rare perfections, that with the bare act of his will he raiſes himſelf ſo high, as to touch the ſtars with his head, and both the poles with his two hands. Ram beſought him ſo earneſtly to aſſiſt him in ſearching for his wife, that Innuman, overjoy'd to meet with an opportunity of doing him ſervice, immediately ſet out for that purpoſe. The ape-god hunted over every part of the main land, but not meeting what he wanted, he went over into the iſland of Ceylan, where he found Sidi, whom he took by the hand, carried her off to the continent, and left her under a ſtrong and faithful guard. After this he return'd back into the iſland, when aſſuming the ſhape of a bear, he ran over every part of it, made a dreadful havock, not ſo much as ſparing the giant's palace who reign'd there. This expedition ended, he reſum'd his natural ſhape, and with his tail defeated three powerful armies of giants, preſented himſelf before Ravanen, and without paying the leaſt regard to his regal character, gave him a box o'the ear, and kill'd his ſon in his preſence. Several of the ſtrongeſt giants ran to ſuccour their prince. Theſe put a ſtop to the havock this dreadful ape was making, who now ſuffer'd himſelf to be taken priſoner. Immediately a council was ſummon'd to conſider what puniſhment they ſhould inflict upon him; the reſult of the debates was, that they ſhould put him to an uncommon kind of death. In execution of this ſentence, they ty'd to the ape's tail a multitude of bales of cotton, which were at that time in the cuſtom-houſe ware-houſes; which being done, they threw ſo great a quantity of oil on them, that they almoſt ſwam in it, and immediately ſet fire to them, in order to burn Innuman to aſhes. However the ſubtle ape eluded the deſigns of his enemies, for leaving the palace with his load upon him, he ran over all the city and the whole iſland; ſet fire to all the places thro' which he paſs'd, and cauſed ſo general and dreadful a conflagration, that it would have been impoſſible for the giant Ravanen to have ſecur'd himſelf and his wife from it, had they not got up into Devandiren's chariot, and ſhelter'd themſelves in the clouds.

In the mean time Innuman left Ceylan, when he again went to Sidi, and reſtor'd her to her husband. Ram thank'd the ape-god for this ſignal ſervice he had done him, but being reſolutely bent to revenge the affront which had been put upon him in carrying off his wife, he therefore conjur'd him to continue his aſſiſtance. The ape agreed to it, when they ſet out together, and ſoon raiſed an army of upwards of five hundred millions of apes, when they went and beſieg'd the fortreſs of the king of Ceylan. This fortreſs was ſurrounded with ſeven walls, the firſt of which was iron, the ſecond of copper, the third of [a] braſs, the fourth of yellow braſs, the fifth of a compoſition of ſeveral mix'd metals, the ſixth of ſilver, and the ſeventh of gold.

Ravanen knowing the importance of this ſtrong hold, immediately ſent ambaſſadors to his brother Cambucarnen, to demand ſuccours of him, and deſir'd that he himſelf would head them. This Cambucarnen was a giant of an enormous ſize, who at that time commanded upwards of four hundred millions of giants, whoſe united force had hitherto been invincible. Upon this advice he immediately haſted to his brother's aſſiſtance, and arriv'd in the iſland of Ceylan, where he was no ſooner come, but ſeveral battles enſued between the giants and the apes, great numbers of whom were kill'd upon the ſpot on both ſides.

'Twas in one of theſe engagements that Cambucarnen fell by the hand of Ram, which ſo damp'd the courage of the giants, and raiſed that of the apes, that they carried on the ſiege much more briskly than before. Ravanen finding his affairs in a very ill poſture, and deſirous of uſing the privilege, which in his opinion, render'd him almoſt immortal, offer'd to put an end to the ſtrife by fighting Ram in ſingle combat. The latter accepting the challenge, they fought; gave each other dreadful blows, with one of which Ram was wounded, and ready to ſink under his enemy; but the blood which flow'd from his wound, rouzing his fainting courage, he found himſelf endued with freſh ſtrength. Upon this he took out an arrow, and directed his aim ſo happily, that it pierc'd Ravanen's breaſt, broke the veſſel which contain'd the fatal liquor, on the preſervation whereof his life depended, and with this ſingle ſtroke laid him dead at his feet.

Ram, after ſo ſignal and important a victory, abandon'd the fortreſs to the plunder of the apes, who had afforded him ſuch ſeaſonable ſuccour. They found immenſe wealth in it, not to mention the gold and ſilver walls which were broken down, and carried away; away; ſo that there was not one in all this numerous army, but return'd back into his country loaded with the moſt precious ſpoils. Ravanen had a brother left, Vibuxanen by name, who was a mighty giant and endued with ſeveral good qualities. Vibuxanen had not intermeddled in his brother's quarrel, nor in the war which afterwards broke out upon that account; wherefore Ram, contenting himſelf with having got his wife back, and had reveng'd himſelf on his enemies, gave thoſe dominions to Vibuxanen, of which he had diſpoſſeſs'd Ravanen. He even concluded an alliance with him, after which he withdrew with his dear Sidi, into a calm and peaceable retirement, where they both have reſided ever ſince that time.

A LETTER

From Father Bouchet a Jeſuit, Miſſionary to Maduras, and Superior of the new Miſſion of Carnate,

To Monſr. Huet, Biſhop of Avranches.

MY LORD,

THE labours of a perſon who undertakes to preach the Goſpel in the Eaſt-Indians, are ſo great and ſo uninterrupted, that one would think the employment of preaching the name of Chriſt Jeſus to the idolaters, and enlightning the minds of the new converts, are enough of themſelves to take up all a miſſionary's time: and indeed, in certain ſeaſons of the year, he is ſo far from having any leiſure for ſtudy, that he can ſcarce find time to take the neceſſary refreſhments, but is often oblig'd to ſubtract from his nightly repoſe, thoſe hours he ought to devote to prayer and the other exerciſes of his profeſſion.

However, my Lord, in other ſeaſons, and even in certain hours of the day, we have time ſufficient for unbending the mind by ſome kind of ſtudy. Our care is then to make even thoſe intervals ſerviceable to our holy religion. In this view we apply ourſelves to ſuch ſciences as are in greateſt vogue among thoſe idolaters, at whoſe converſion we labour; and endeavour to find out arguments from their very errors, by which we may convince them of the truth we preach.

'Twas in thoſe ſeaſons, when I was allow'd ſome leiſure from the ordinary cares of the miniſterial function, that I ſearched as cloſely as poſſible, into the ſyſtem of the religion of theſe Indians. My deſign, my Lord, by this letter, is only to ſet before your Lordſhip, and to advance certain conjectures, which I preſume are of that weight as to claim all your attention. The general ſcope of them is, to prove that the Indians borrow'd their religion from the books of Moſes and the prophets; that all the fictions with which their books abound, do not yet ſo abſolutely darken truth, as to prevent her being known; and that, in fine, we may diſcover among theſe idolaters, not to mention the religion of the Hebrews, with which, their commerce with the Jews and Egyptians, had given them an opportunity of being acquainted, or at leaſt with ſome particulars of it; we may diſcover, I ſay, ſeveral evident ſoötſteps of the chriſtian religion, that was preach'd to them by the apoſtle St. Thomas, by Pantænus, and ſeveral other great men, even ſo early as the firſt ages of the church.

I did not in the leaſt doubt, my Lord, but you would approve the liberty I have taken to addreſs this letter to your Lordſhip. I imagin'd, that a ſeries of reflections which may be of ſervice in confirming and defending our holy religion, naturally laid claim to your Lordſhip's patronage. You will think this more immediately your concern, as you have ſo finely demonſtrated the truth of our faith, by a moſt profound erudition, as well as a perfect knowledge of antiquity both ſacred and profane.

I remember, my Lord, to have read in your learned treatiſe of the Evangelical Demonſtration, that the doctrine of Moſes had reach'd the Indies: and your great care while you peruſed the various authors you have read, in obſerving whatever may be ſerviceable to our holy religion, has made your Lordſhip to get the ſtart of me in ſeveral particulars which I ſhould otherwiſe have taken notice of. I ſhall therefore only add ſuch new diſcoveries as I myſelf have made among them, by the ſtudy of their moſt antient books, and the familiarity which the Learned of that country indulg'd me.

'Tis certain, my Lord, that the generality of the Indians are no ways tainted with the abſurdities of atheiſm. They have ſome pretty juſt ideas of the Deity, tho' adulterated and corrupted by the worſhip of idols. They acknowledge the Being of an infinitely perfect God, exiſting from all eternity, and who comprehends in himſelf the moſt excellent attributes. Thus far every thing is well, nor can any thing be more conformable to the notions which chriſtians have of the Deity. Here follows what idolatry has unhappily graſted on that ſtock.

Moſt of the Indians maintain, that the great croud of Divinities which they adore at this day, are no more than ſo many ſubaltern Gods, ſubject to the ſupreme Being, who is equally Lord over Gods and men. This great God, ſay they, is infinitely ſuperior to all other Beings; and this infinite diſtance prevents his having any correſpondence or communication with frail creatures. And indeed, ſay they, what proportion can there be between a Being of infinite perfection, and ſuch created Beings as we; a mere aſſemblage of frailties and imperfections? 'Tis for this very reaſon, ſay they, that Parabaravaſtou, i. e. the ſupreme God, has created three inferior Divinities, viz. Bruma, Vichnou, and Routren. To the firſt he has given the power of creating; to the ſecond of preſerving; and to the third that of deſtroying.

But theſe three Gods, who are worſhip'd by the Indians, are, in the opinion of their learned men, the children of one wife, call'd Parachatti, or, the ſupreme Power. Were we to reduce this fiction to its original ſtate, we then ſhould eaſily diſcover the truth, tho' darkned and clouded over by the ridiculous fictions which the father of lyes has added to it.

All the antient Indians meant by this, was, that every thing which is done in the world, whether by creation, which they aſcribe to Bruma; or by preſervation, attributed to Vichnou; or laſtly, by the different changes, which are the work of Routren, reſult entirely from the abſolute power of Parabaravaſtou, or the ſupreme God. Theſe carnal minds afterwards ſuppoſed this Parachatti to be a woman, and that ſhe had three children, which are no more than the chief effects of almighty power: indeed Chatti, in the Indian language, ſignifies power; and Para, ſupreme or abſolute.

This idea the Indians have of a Being infinitely ſuperior to the other Deities, is at leaſt a teſtimony that the antients did in reality adore but one God; and that Polytheiſm got footing among them no otherwiſe than it did in all other idolatrous countries.

I don't, my Lord, pretend to affirm, that theſe firſt elements of religion are a clear and manifeſt proof of the Indians having a correſpondence with the Jews or Egyptians. I am very ſenſible that God almighty has, without ſuch aſſiſtances, engrav'd this fundamental truth in the minds of all men; and that nothing can have the power of erazing it, but the depravity and corruption of their hearts. For the ſame reaſon, I ſhall not trouble you with the notions the Indians have of the immortality of the ſoul, and ſeveral other truths of the ſame nature.

However, I believe your Lordſhip will not be diſpleaſed, if I ſet before you the manner in which theſe Indians fancy they find in their authors an explanation of the reſemblance which man bears to the ſupreme Being. Here follows what a learned Bramin told me he had copied on this head, from one of their moſt antient writers.

Figure to your ſelf, ſays that author, a million of great veſſels fill'd with water, on which the ſun darts all his rays. This beautiful planet, tho' but one, does nevertheleſs multiply itſelf in ſome meaſure, and paints itſelf entirely in an inſtant in each of theſe veſſels; we ſee an image of the ſun very exactly reflected in each of theſe veſſels. Our bodies are theſe veſſels fill'd with water, the ſun is an emblem of the ſupreme Being, and the reflection or image of the ſun on each of theſe veſſels, is a pretty natural repreſentation of the ſoul created in the ſimilitude of God himſelf.

I proceed to certain circumſtances, wherein what I firſt aſſerted will appear more ſtrongly, and better adapted to ſatisfy a perſon of your Lordſhip's exquiſite penetration. Suffer me barely to relate to you the things themſelves, with the ſame ſimplicity as they were told me. 'Twou'd be trifling in me to interſperſe my own private reflections, at a time when I'm writing to ſo learned a prelate.

The Indians, as I before obſerv'd, believe, that Bruma is that God among the three ſubaltern ones, to whom the ſupreme Deity gave the power of creating. Bruma therefore created the firſt man; but a circumſtance which falls in exactly with my ſubject, is, that Bruma form'd man of the mud or ſlime of the newly-created earth. He had indeed ſome trouble before he could finiſh his work; he try'd and try'd again, and at the third effort found his meaſure was exact. Fiction has grafted this laſt circumſtance on truth, and we are not to wonder, that a God of the ſecond order, ſhould be oblig'd, as it were, to ſerve an apprenticeſhip before he could create man in that boaſted perfection and harmony of all his parts. But had the Indians gone no farther than what nature, or poſſibly their acquaintance with the Jews, had taught them concerning the unity of God, they then would have been ſatisfied with what they had learn'd by the ſame canal, with regard to the creation of man; and in that caſe would barely have ſaid, as they do with the holy ſcriptures, that man was form'd of the duſt of the ground, newly come from the hands of the Creator.

However this, my Lord, is not all; man being once created by Bruma, but with the labour and trouble I before obſerved, the more pains the new creator had taken in the forming his creature, the more he was delighted with his work. The buſineſs now is to place it in an habitation worthy its exalted dignity.

The ſcripture has deſcrib'd the terreſtrial paradiſe as an inchanting place; and the Indians have not made their Chorcam leſs delicious. They tell us, 'tis a garden of delights, abounding with all kind of fruits. That we there ſee a tree whoſe fruits, were they not forbidden, would give immortality to all who ſhould taſte them.

We could ſcarce imagine, that it were poſſible for a people who had never heard the leaſt mention of the terreſtrial paradiſe, to draw a picture of it ſo much reſembling the original.

One very ſurprizing circumſtance, my Lord, is, that the ſubaltern Gods, who have ever ſince the creation, been multiplying themſelves almoſt to infinitude; did not enjoy, or at leaſt were not certain of enjoying, the privilege of immortality, which undoubtedly would have been very grateful to them. Here follows a ſtory that the Indians relate upon this occaſion, which how fabulous ſoever it may be, was certainly originally borrow'd from the doctrine of the Hebrews, and perhaps that of the Chriſtians.

The Gods, ſay the Indians, employ'd every art to make themſelves immortal. After numberleſs, fruitleſs endeavours, they reſolv'd to have recourſe to the tree of life which grew in Chorcam. They met with ſucceſs, ſo that by eating from time to time of the fruits of this tree, they preſerved the precious treaſure, which it ſo highly concerns them not to loſe. At length a famous ſerpent, call'd Cheien, perceiv'd that the tree of life had been found out by the Gods of the ſecond claſs. As 'tis very probable that he had been appointed to guard this tree, he was ſo highly exaſperated at his being over-reach'd, that he immediately poured out a great quantity of poiſon. The whole earth felt the dreadful effects of it, and not one mortal was to eſcape its malignant influence. But the God Chiven taking pity of human nature, reveal'd himſelf under the ſhape of a man, and immediately ſwallow'd the poiſon with which the malicious ſerpent had infected the univerſe.

You ſee, my Lord, that things begin to clear up a little, in proportion as we advance forward. I muſt beg your attention while I repeat a new fiction; a fiction I ſay, for I ſhould impoſe upon your Lordſhip, were I to give it a more ſerious name. In this fable, notwithſtanding all the fabulous circumſtances with which it is clouded, you will plainly diſcover the hiſtory of the flood, and the chief circumſtances thereof as related in ſcripture.

The God Routren, who is the grand deſtroyer of all created Beings, reſolv'd one day to drown all mankind, pretending he had juſt reaſons to be diſſatisfied with their behaviour. This deſign was not kept ſo ſecret but it was found out by Vichnou, preſerver of all creatures; whom you will find, my Lord, obliged them in a moſt ſignal manner on this occaſion, for he diſcover'd the very day on which the flood was to happen. Tho' his power did not extend ſo far as to ſuſpend the execution of what the God Routren had reſolved upon, yet, as he was the God preſerver of all created Beings, this gave him a right to prevent, if poſſible, the pernicious effects of it. The methods he took for that purpoſe was as follows.

He one day appear'd to Sattiavarti his great confident, and privately aſſur'd him that an univerſal flood would ſoon happen; that the earth would be cover'd with water, and that Routren's deſign was no leſs than that of thereby deſtroying all mankind, and every kind of animal. He nevertheleſs aſſur'd him, that he himſelf need not be under the leaſt apprehenſions; for that in ſpight of Routren, he wou'd find opportunity to preſerve him, and to take ſuch meaſures that the world ſhould afterwards be repeopled. His deſign was to make a wonderful Bark riſe up on a ſudden, at a time when Routren ſhould leaſt ſuſpect any ſuch thing, and to ſtore it with a large proviſion of ſouls, and ſeeds of Beings, eight hundred and forty millions at leaſt. As for Sattiavarti, he, at the time of the flood, was to be upon a very high mountain, which he pointed out to him very exactly. Some time after, Sattiavarti, as had been foretold him, perceiv'd a numberleſs multitude of clouds drawing together; but beheld with unconcern the ſtorm which was gathering over the heads of the guilty, when the moſt dreadful rain that had ever been ſeen, pour'd down from the skies; the rivers ſwell'd, and ſpread themſelves with rapidity over the ſurface of the whole earth; the ſea broke its appointed bounds, and mixing with the rivers which now had left their channels, ſoon cover'd the higheſt mountains. Trees, animals, men, cities, kingdoms, were all drown'd; in a word, all animated Beings were inſtantly deſtroy'd.

In the mean time Sattiavarti, with ſome of his penitents, had withdrawn to the appointed mountain, where he waited for the ſuccour which the God had promiſed him. However, this did not prevent his being ſeiz'd with ſome ſhort intervals of terror. As the water gather'd ſtrength continually as it roul'd, and each moment drew nearer to his aſylum, he was every now and then in a panic. But that very inſtant he thought would be his laſt, he beheld the bark which was to ſave him. No ſooner did he ſet his eyes upon it, than he immediately got into it with all the devotees in his company, and alſo the eight hundred and forty millions of ſouls and ſeeds of Beings.

The difficulty now was how to ſteer the bark, and to preſerve it from the impetuoſity of the waves, which raged with prodigious violence; but Vichnou took care of this, for immediately aſſuming the ſhape of a fiſh, ſteer'd the ſhip with his tail, as tho' it had been a rudder. The God was now both fiſh and pilot, play'd his part ſo well, that Sattiavarti waited very quietly in his aſylum, till ſuch time as the waters were run off from the ſurface of the earth.

The circumſtance, my Lord, you ſee is ſo plain, that a perſon of very little penetration, may plainly diſcover in this relation, notwithſtanding its being clouded over with with fiction, and work'd up in ſo groteſque a manner, the particulars which the ſacred writings inform us concerning the deluge, the ark, and the preſervation of Noah and his family.

But the Indians did not ſtop here; for after having diſguiſed Noah under the name of Sattiavarti, they may poſſibly have apply'd the moſt ſingular incidents in Abraham's hiſtory to Brama. Here follows certain incidents which, in my opinion, bear a great reſemblance to the original from whence they were borrow'd.

In the firſt place, the conformity of the two names ſeems to ſtrengthen my conjectures, for 'tis plain that the word Brama, does not differ very much in ſound from Abraham. It were to be wiſh'd, that the Literati, in their deducing of etymologies, had not adopted ſeveral which are leſs reaſonable and leſs forc'd.

This Brama, whoſe name comes ſo near to that of Abraham, was married to a wife, whom all the Indians in general call Saraſvadi. Do you, my Lord, judge of the weight which the name of this woman adds to my firſt conjecture. The two laſt ſyllables of the word Saraſvadi, are, in the Indian language, an honourable termination; ſo that Vadi, anſwers pretty nearly the Engliſh word Madam. We meet with this termination in ſeveral names of women of a diſtinguiſh'd character. As for inſtance, in that of Parvadi, wife of Routrem. From hence 'tis evident, that the two firſt ſyllables of Saraſvadi, which probably make the whole name of Brama's wife, reduce themſelves to Sara, which is the name of Sarah, wife of Abraham.

There is however ſomething ſtill more ſingular than all this. Brama among the Indians, as Abraham among the Jews, was the chief of ſeveral Caſtes or different tribes. Both nations agree very exactly in the number of theſe tribes. At Tricherapali, where is now the moſt famous temple in all India, a feſtival is annually celebrated, at which a venerable old man walks with twelve children before him, to repreſent, as the Indians ſay, the twelve tribes of the principal Caſtes. 'Tis indeed true, that ſome Doctors think this old man repreſents Vichnou, but neither the learned nor the common people agree with them in this particular, but univerſally affirm, that Brama is the chief of all the tribes.

Be that as it will, I humbly preſume, that in ſearching for the doctrine of the Hebrews in that of the Indians, 'tis not neceſſary the circumſtances ſhould agree in every particular. The Indians frequently aſcribe to ſeveral perſons, what the ſcripture relates of one only; or join together in one, what the ſacred writings divide into ſeveral. But this difference, ſo far from deſtroying our conjectures, muſt rather ſupport them; and in my opinion, too affected a reſemblance would make the whole ſuſpected.

This being ſuppoſed, I proceed to relate to your Lordſhip thoſe particulars which the Indians have borrow'd from the hiſtory of Abraham, whether they aſcribe it to Brama, or to ſome other among their Gods and Heroes.

The Indians honour the memory of one of their penitents, who, in the ſame manner as the patriarch Abraham, was juſt upon the point of ſacrificing his ſon to one of the Gods of the country. This God had required this victim of him, but was contented with the father's obedience, and would not ſuffer him to put his ſon to death. Some however affirm that the child was ſacrificed, but that God afterwards raiſed him from the dead.

I met with a cuſtom, in one of the Indian Caſtes, I mean that call'd the Caſte of thieves, which very much ſurprized me. Your Lordſhip is not to imagine, tho' there is an entire tribe of thieves among theſe people, that all who exerciſe this honourable profeſſion are collected into one particular body; or have, excluſive of all others, a privilege to thieve. It means no more, than that all the Indians of this Caſte are prodigiouſly addicted to thieving; but unhappily, they are not the only people a man is to guard againſt.

This premiſed, which I preſume is not improper, I return to my hiſtory. I find that the members of this Caſte uſe circumciſion; but 'tis not practiſed on children, but on perſons of about twenty years of age. None but the principal members of the Caſte are obliged to practiſe this ceremony. 'Tis of great antiquity, and 'twou'd be difficult to diſcover, whence a people, who are entirely given up to idolatry, ſhould have borrow'd it.

You have, my Lord, ſeen the hiſtory of Noah and the flood in Vichnou and Sattiavarti; that of Abraham in Brama and Vichnou: your Lordſhip will undoubtedly be pleaſed to find the hiſtory of Moſes in that of the ſame Gods; and I am perſuaded you will find it leſs diſfigur'd than the preceding ones.

Nothing, I think, can more juſtly hit the character of Moſes, than the Vichnou of the Indians metamorphoſed into Chrichnen. For firſt, Chrichnen in the Indian language ſignifies black; by which is meant, that Chrichnen came from a country whoſe inhabitants are of that colour. The Indians add, that one of Chrichnen's neareſt relations, who was an infant, being laid in a cradle, was expoſed on a great river, where he was in manifeſt danger of periſhing. That he was taken from thence, and being a very beautiful babe, was carried to a great princeſs, who had him fed, and afterwards took care of his education.

I cannot tell why the Indians have aſcrib'd this incident to one of Chrichnen's relations, rather than to Crichnen himſelf. What, my Lord, muſt be done in this caſe? My buſineſs is to give you a bare narration of facts, and not to diſguiſe the truth for the ſake of making a greater conformity between the incidents. 'Twas not therefore Chrichnen, but one of his relations, who was brought up in the palace of a great princeſs. Here the compariſon with Moſes is defective, but now follows what will in ſome meaſure compenſate that defect.

No ſooner was Chrichnen born, but he alſo was expoſed in a great river, to prevent his falling a victim to the king's anger, who was reſolved to put him to death the moment he ſhould come into the world. The river, out of veneration for the child, ſmooth'd its ſurface, and would not ſuffer its waters to hurt ſo precious a charge. The child was taken out of this inconſtant element, and brought up among the ſhepherds. He afterwards married with the daughters of thoſe ſhepherds, and for a long time kept the flocks of his ſeveral fathers-in-law. The young man ſoon diſtinguiſh'd himſelf from the reſt of his companions, who elected him for their chief, when he perform'd wonders in protecting the flocks and thoſe who kept them. He put the king to death, who had threatned them with a bloody war; and was purſued by his enemies, when finding himſelf unable to make head againſt them, he withdrew towards the ſea, which immediately contracted its waters to open them a paſſage, after which they ſuddenly cloſed, and thereby overwhelm'd all his purſuers; by which means he eſcap'd their cruelty.

What man, my Lord, after having heard this incident, but would firmly believe that the Indians knew Moſes under the name of Vichnou, metamorphoſed into Chrichnen? But to the knowledge of this famous leader of God's people, they have join'd that of ſeveral cuſtoms, written by him in the pentateuch, as well as of ſeveral laws by him promulgated, and obſerv'd ſince his time.

Among theſe cuſtoms, which the Indians muſt certainly have borrow'd from the Jews, and which they ſtill obſerve, I reckon frequent bathings, purifications, an extreme horror and averſion to dead carcaſſes, whoſe bare touch they think would make them unclean; the different order and diſtinction of Caſtes; the law which abſolutely prohibits one Caſte or tribe to marry into another. I ſhould never have done, were I to go through the ſeveral particulars, and ſhall therefore only preſent your Lordſhip with a few remarks which are not often met with in the works of the Learned.

I was acquainted with an Indian Bramin, a man of a very ſuperior genius, who told me the following ſtory, the ſenſe of which, he ſaid, he himſelf did not underſtand, when he was an idolater. The moſt celebrated ſacrifice among the Eaſt-Indians is call'd Ekiam, in which a ſheep is the victim. A kind of prayer is repeated in it, when they they pronounce the following words with a loud voice; When will the Saviour be born? when will the Redeemer appear?

This ſacrifice of a ſheep bears, in my opinion, a great affinity with that of the Paſchal lamb. For we are here to obſerve, that as all the Jews were obliged to eat their portion of the victim, ſo the Bramins, tho' they are not allow'd to eat meat, have nevertheleſs a diſpenſation for it on the day of the ſacrifice of Ekiam, and are obliged by their law to eat of the victim ſheep, which they divide among themſelves.

Several Indians worſhip fire, and their Gods themſelves have ſacrificed victims to that element. There is a particular injunction with regard to the ſacrifice of Oman, by which they are commanded to keep a perpetual fire, and never to let it go out. The perſon who aſſiſts at the Ekiam, muſt take care to ſupply it every morning and evening with wood, which agrees pretty nearly with the command in Leviticus, chap. vi. verſ. 12 and 13. And the fire upon the altar ſhall be burning in it, it ſhall not be put out; and the prieſt ſhall burn wood on it every morning.——The Indians have diſcover'd a ſtill greater veneration for fire, for they threw themſelves into the midſt of the flames. Your Lordſhip will agree with me, that they had better not have added this cruel cuſtom to the other particulars they have borrow'd from the Jews on that head. The Indians alſo entertain a high idea of ſerpents, which they believe have ſomething divine in them, and that the bare ſeeing them brings happineſs along with it; for which reaſon great numbers worſhip theſe creatures, and pay them the utmoſt reſpect: but notwithſtanding this, theſe ungrateful animals don't therefore ſpare their votaries, but on the contrary bite them very cruelly. Had the brazen ſerpent which Moſes ſhow'd the people of God, whoſe bare ſight cured diſeaſes, been of as blood-thirſty a nature as the living ſerpents in the Indies, I very much queſtion whether the Jews would ever have been tempted to worſhip it.

Laſtly, let me add the great humanity of the Indians for their ſlaves, to whom they are almoſt as kind as if they were their own children. They take the utmoſt care of their education, provide them all things with a liberal hand, ſo that they want neither clothes or victuals; they likewiſe beſtow them in marriage, and generally manumize them. Would one not conclude, that Moſes had calculated the precepts which we read in Leviticus upon that head, equally for the Jews and Indians.

How can we therefore, my Lord, any longer doubt, but the Indians had antiently ſome knowledge of the law of Moſes? What they alſo mention of their law, and of Brama their legiſlator, is, in my opinion, ſo clear, that it will be impoſſible for us to ſuſpend any longer our belief on that head.

Brama gave the law to man, that is, the Vedam or book of the law, which the Indians look upon as infallible and unerring. They aſſert that this is the pure and uncorrupted word of God, dictated by Abadam, i. e. He who cannot err, and who eſſentially ſpeaks truth. The Vedam, or law of the Indians, is divided into four parts; but there was antiently a fifth, according to the learned Indians, which time has depriv'd them of, and that there is no poſſibility of its ever being recover'd again.

The Indians have an inexpreſſible veneration for the law which they received from Brama. The profound awe with which they liſten to it when read; the choice of perſons for reading it to the people; the preparations which are to be made on that account, and a thouſand other circumſtances, correſpond exactly with what has been taught us concerning the Jews, with reſpect to the ſacred law and to Moſes who deliver'd it to them.

The misfortune, my Lord, is, that the Indians have their law in ſuch great eſteem and veneration, that they conceal it from the Chriſtians with the moſt religious ſecrecy. However, ſome of their Doctors have given me inſight enough into it, as will enable me to prove, that the books of the law of the pretended Brama, are borrow'd from the pentateuch of Moſes.

The firſt part of the Vedam, which they call Irroucou-vedam, treats of the firſt cauſe, and the manner in which the world was created. The moſt remarkable circumſtance they related to me on this head, with regard to our ſubject, is, that in the beginning there was nothing but God and the waters; and that God was carried on the waters. We may eaſily obſerve an affinity between this circumſtance and the firſt chapter of Geneſis.

Several Bramins have aſſur'd me, that there are a great number of moral precepts in the third book, entitled Sama-vedam. This doctrine appear'd to me to bear a very near relation to the moral precepts with which the book of Exodus is interſperſed.

The fourth book, entitled Adarana-vedam, contains the different ſacrifices which are to be offered; the qualities requiſite in the victims; the manner of building the temples, and the different feſtivals that are to be celebrated. The idea of theſe, without ſtraining our conjectures, we may naturally ſuppoſe to have been borrow'd from the books of Leviticus and Deuteronomy.

In fine, my Lord, that not ſo much as one ſingle circumſtance may be wanting to complete the parallel; as Moſes receiv'd the law on the famous mountain of Sinai, ſo Brama was with the Vedam on the celebrated mountain of Mahamerou. This Indian mountain was call'd Meros by the Greeks, on which, they tell us, Bacchus was born, and that it was choſen by the Gods for the place of their reſidence. The modern Indians ſay, that their Chorcams, or different paradiſes, are on this mountain.

It may not be improper, my Lord, after having been thus diffuſive on Moſes and the law, to make ſome mention of Miriam, ſiſter to that great prophet. I am greatly miſtaken if the Indians had not ſome little knowledge of her hiſtory.

The ſcripture relates that Miriam, after the miraculous paſſage of the red-ſea, aſſembled the Iſraelitiſh women; that ſhe took inſtruments of muſic into her hand, and fell a dancing with her companions, and ſinging the praiſes of the Almighty. Here follows a circumſtance of the ſame import, which the Indians relate of their famous Lakehoumi. This woman, as well as Miriam, Moſes's ſiſter, eſcap'd the dangers of the ſea by a kind of miracle. No ſooner was ſhe on ſhore, but ſhe made a magnificent ball, at which all the Gods and Goddeſſes danced to the ſound of inſtruments.

It would be no difficult matter for me, after having proceeded thus far with the books of Moſes, to go on with the other hiſtorical books of the ſcripture, and to find incidents in the tradition of the Indians, ſufficient to continue my compariſon. But fearing leſt this would tire your Lordſhip, I ſhall content my ſelf with preſenting you with one or two hiſtories more, that ſtruck me moſt, and make beſt for my ſubject.

The firſt which preſents itſelf, is that which the Indians publiſh under the name of Arichandiren. This man was a very antient king of India, from the ſeveral circumſtances of whoſe life, certain little particulars and his name excepted, we may conclude that he is the ſame with Job.

The Gods met one day in their Chorcam, or paradiſe of delights; Devendiren the God of glory preſided in this illuſtrious aſſembly, which was crouded with Gods and Goddeſſes: the moſt famous penitents had alſo a place in it, particularly the ſeven chief Anchorets.

After ſome indifferent diſcourſes had paſs'd between them, the following queſtion was propoſed, viz. whether it be poſſible to find a faultleſs prince among mankind. Almoſt all of them aſſerted, that there was not one but was ſubject to great vices; and the partizans of this opinion were headed by Vichouva-moutren. But the famous Vachichten oppoſed him, and maintain'd ſtrenuouſly that king Arichandiren, his diſciple, was an unblemiſh'd prince. Vichouva-moutren, who is of ſo imperious a temper, that he cannot bear contradiction, fell into a great paſſion, and aſſur'd the Gods he would ſoon ſhew them the defects of this prince, in caſe they would give him up entirely into his hands.

Vachichten

Vachichten accepted the challenge, when it was ſtipulated, that he whoſe aſſertion ſhould prove falſe, ſhould give up to the other all the merit he might have acquir'd by a long ſeries of penance: But now poor king Arichandiren became the victim of this diſpute; Vichouva-moutren put him to every kind of tryal, by reducing him to extreme poverty; diſpoſſeſſing him of his kingdom; taking away the life of his only ſon, and carrying off his wife Chandirandi.

However, the prince, notwithſtanding all theſe misfortunes, continued ſo glorioufly ſtedfaſt in the practice of all the virtues, that the Gods themſelves, who put him to all thoſe ſharp tryals, would infallibly have ſunk under them; and indeed thoſe Deities rewarded him with uncommon liberality; they embrac'd him one after another, and even the Goddeſſes themſelves made him their compliments. They reſtor'd his wife to him, and rais'd up his ſon; after which, Vichouva-moutren, purſuant to the agreement, reſign'd all the merit he had acquir'd to Vachichten, who made a preſent of it to king Arichandiren, whereupon the vanquiſh'd Vichouva-moutren went away with great regret, to begin again a long ſeries of penance, in order, if poſſible, to acquire a large ſtock of freſh merit.

The ſecond hiſtory I ſhall relate to your Lordſhip, has ſomething more fatal in it, and bears a greater reſemblance to an incident in the hiſtory of Sampſon, than the fable of Arichandiren does to the ſtory of Job.

The Indians aſſert, that their God Ramen undertook once upon a time the conqueſt of Ceilan, to ſucceed in which, this conqueror, tho' a God, thought proper to make uſe of the following ſtratagem. He rais'd an army of apes, and ſet an ape of diſtinction, call'd Anouman, at their head; he then caus'd his tail to be enwrap'd with ſeveral pieces of linnen cloth, on which ſeveral veſſels of oil were pour'd; which being done, they ſet fire to it, when the ape ſcouring up and down the country, thro' fields of corn, thro' woods, towns and cities, put all into a flame; inſomuch, that he burnt down every thing that came in his way, and almoſt reduc'd the whole iſland to aſhes. After ſuch an expedition as this, 'twas a very eaſy matter to conquer the whole iſland, nor did it require the power of a mighty God to obtain this conqueſt.

I have poſſibly, my Lord, been a little too prolix on the conformity of the doctrine of the Indians with that of the people of God, and ſhall therefore endeavour to attone for it, by contracting what I intended to trouble you with on a ſecond point, which like the former, I reſolv'd to ſubmit to your ſuperior judgment and penetration. I ſhall therefore confine myſelf to a few curſory reflections, which leave me no room to doubt that the Indians who live in the moſt inland parts, had ſome knowledge of the Chriſtian Religion in the primitive ages; and that both they, and the inhabitants of the coaſt, were inſtructed in it by St. Thomas, and the firſt diſciples of the Apoſtles.

I begin by the confus'd idea which the Indians ſtill entertain of the ever-bleſſed Trinity, that was formerly preach'd to them. I have already taken notice of the three principal Gods of the Indians; viz. Bruma, Vichnou, and Routren. Indeed moſt of the heathens affirm them to be three ſeparate, and quite different Deities; but ſeveral Nianiguels, or ſpiritual men, aſſure, that theſe three Gods, tho' they ſeem to be different, are in reality but one God; that when this God acts with his creative and almighty power, he is call'd Bruma; and Vichnou, when he preſerves created beings, and exhibits any marks of his goodneſs; and laſtly, that he goes by the name of Routren, whenever he deſtroys cities, puniſhes the guilty, or makes mankind feel the dread effects of his juſt anger.

Not many years ſince, a Bramin explain'd the notion he had of the fabulous Trinity of the heathens, as follows. We muſt, ſays he, repreſent to ourſelves God and his three different names, that correſpond to his three chief attributes, pretty nearly under the idea of thoſe triangular pyramids, which are rais'd before the gate of certain temples.

Your Lordſhip may ſuppoſe, that I ſhall not pretend to affirm this notion of the Indians agrees very exactly with the Chriſtian ſyſtem. However, it at leaſt ſhews they once had a purer light, tho' it has been ſince clouded by the difficulties of a myſtery, which is ſo far above the reach of man's weak reaſon.

The particulars which relate to the myſtery of the incarnation are ſtill more envelop'd in fiction. But all the Indians are univerſally agreed, that God had aſſum'd the fleſh ſeveral times, and moſt of them aſcribe theſe incarnations to Vichnou, the ſecond God in their trinity; and this God, ſay they, never aſſum'd the fleſh, but in quality of Saviour and Redeemer of mankind?

Your Lordſhip may perceive that I am as conciſe as poſſible; I now paſs to our ſacraments. The Indians ſay, that bathing in certain rivers will infallibly waſh out every ſin; and that this myſterious water not only cleanſes the body, but alſo purifies the ſoul after a wonderful manner. May not this probably be a tincture ſtill preſerv'd by them of the idea they once had of baptiſm?

I had not obſerv'd any thing particular with regard to the bleſſed ſacrament; however, a converted Bramin acquainted me ſome time ſince, with a circumſtance which is conſiderable enough to be mention'd in this place. The fragments which remain at the ſacrifices, and the rice which is given to eat in the temples, are call'd by the Indians Prajadam, ſignifying in our tongue divine grace, and is what we expreſs by the Greek word εὐχαριστία. That they were acquainted with confeſſion, is, I believe, pretty manifeſt; and therefore I believe, my Lord, it may not be improper to be a little more diffuſive upon that head.

'Tis a kind of maxim among the Indians, that he who confeſſes his ſin ſhall be forgiven. Cheida param chounal Tiroum. They celebrate a feſtival annually, during which, they go and confeſs themſelves on the bank of a river, in order that their ſins may be entirely blotted out. In the famous ſacrifice of Ekiam, the wife of him who preſides in it, is oblig'd to confeſs her ſins; to deſcend to the moſt heinous particulars; and to declare every particular ſin ſhe has committed. An Indian fiction which was told me on that head, will corroborate my conjectures ſtill more.

While Chrichnen was upon earth, the celebrated Draupadi was married to five famous brothers, who were all kings of Maduras. One of theſe princes on a certain day ſhot an arrow at a tree, and ſtruck down a wonderful piece of fruit. This tree belong'd to a celebrated penitent, and bore fruit every month; and this fruit was of ſo nouriſhing a quality, that whoever eat of it did not want any other food for a month together: But as in thoſe remote ages, mankind dreaded the curſes of penitents much more than thoſe of the Gods; the five brethren were afraid leſt the hermit ſhould curſe them, and therefore beſought Chrichnen to aſſiſt them in ſo delicate an affair. The God Vichnou, under the ſhape of Chrichnen, ſaid both to them, and to Draupadi, who was alſo preſent, that he ſaw but one way of repairing ſo great an evil, which was to make a full confeſſion of all the ſins they had committed during the whole courſe of their lives: That the tree whence the fruit had been ſtruck down was ſix cubits in height; that the fruit, in proportion as each of them ſhould confeſs his ſins, ſhould riſe a cubit higher in the air, and that at the end of the laſt confeſſion, it ſhould hang on the tree as before.

This remedy was thought to be a ſevere one, but they were oblig'd either to ſubmit to it, or be obnoxious to the curſes of a penitent. At laſt, the five brethren came to a reſolution at once, and conſented to make a general confeſſion of all their ſins; the difficulty was to prevail upon the woman to do the ſame, which gave them the utmoſt uneaſineſs; for from the inſtant ſhe heard ſhe was to confeſs her ſins, ſhe ſeem'd wholly given up to ſecrecy and ſilence. However, as they ſet the dreadful conſequences of the [a] Sanjas' curſes in the ſtrongeſt light, they at laſt made her promiſe to perform every thing they ſhould require at her hands.

Having made this promiſe, the eldeſt prince began this ungrateful ceremony, and made a very exact confeſſion of the ſeveral particulars of his whole life. As he ſpoke, the the fruit roſe inſenſibly higher, and was not rais'd above a cubit at the end of the firſt confeſſion. The four other princes follow'd the example of their eldeſt brother, when lo! the ſame miracle happen'd; that is, the fruit at the end of the confeſſion of the fifth, was rais'd juſt five cubits higher.

There remain'd but one cubit more, and now 'twas Draupadi's turn, who after a thouſand ſtruggles began her confeſſion, and the fruit roſe inſenſibly higher. She told them ſhe had not omitted a ſingle circumſtance in it, and yet the fruit wanted half a cubit of the tree. 'Twas manifeſt ſhe had either forgot, or rather omitted ſome particulars. The five brothers beſought her with tears, not to ruin herſelf by a falſe modeſty, and at the ſame time involve them in the ſame deſtruction. However, their prayers were ineffectual, when Chrichmen coming to their aſſiſtance, ſhe confeſs'd a ſin relating to thought, which ſhe would willingly have conceal'd. Scarce had ſhe ended, when the fruit compleated its miraculous progreſs, and went of itſelf, and cleav'd to the branch, where it had hung before.

I ſhall here conclude, the long letter with which I have taken the liberty to trouble your Lordſhip, wherein I have given you an account of the ſeveral particulars I have learnt among the Indians, who in all probability were formerly Chriſtians, but afterwards, from time immemorial, relaps'd into the errors of paganiſm. The miſſionaries of our company, in imitation of St. Francis Xavier, have now endeavour'd for upwards of an hundred years to reſtore them to the knowledge of the true God, and the purity of the evangelical worſhip.

Your Lordſhip may obſerve, that at the ſame time we make thoſe abandon'd people taſte the ſweetneſs of our bleſſed Saviour's yoke, we endeavour to do the Literati in Europe ſome ſervice, by the diſcoveries we make in thoſe countries, with which they are not ſufficiently acquainted. Nothing but your Lordſhip's exquiſite penetration, and uninterrupted familiarity with the learned among the ancients, are able to ſupply what may be wanting in us, with regard to the knowledge we acquire among theſe people. If theſe new hints are of any ſervice to religion, no one knows how to make a better uſe of them than your Lordſhip. I am, with the moſt profound reſpect,

My Lord,

Your Lordſhip's moſt Humble,

And moſt Obedient Servant,

BOUCHET,

Miſſionary of the Company of Jeſus.

DISSERTATIONS:

IN WHICH

Several CEREMONIES in the Religious Worſhip of the EAST-INDIANS are explain'd.

BRAMA.

SOME have been of opinion, that [a] Brama is the ſame with Pythagoras; but 'tis certain the hiſtory of the God, and that of the philoſopher, ſcarce agree in one particular. Beſides, Pythagoras never went into India, and if he has merited an apotheoſis, it could have been only by the doctrine of tranſmigration, which he himſelf firſt imbib'd in Egypt, whence it was carry'd into India by the Egyptians who traded into thoſe parts. It has likewiſe been thought, that the Brama of the ancient and modern Indians, might be the Hermes Triſmegiſtus of the Egyptians, or the Xaca or Xekia of the Japoneze and Chineze. We ſhall wave the diſcuſſion of theſe particulars, as it would ſpin this diſſertation to too great a length.

Brama is the firſt perſon of a kind of Trinity in the heathen theology. This firſt perſon is not only the grand progenitor of all mankind, but has alſo created as many worlds, as he has conſiderable parts in his body. The ſyſtem of this creation, which we have borrow'd from Kircher's China illuſtrated, differs widely from that of the [b] Banians, and that related in Ch. 1. Part I. of the Diſſertation on the Cuſtoms and Religion of the Bramins.

" The Bramins, as Kircher tells us, relate, that the firſt world, which is ſituated " over heaven, was made from Brama's brain, the ſecond from his eyes, the third from " his mouth, the fourth from his left ear, the fifth from the palate of his mouth and " tongue, the ſixth from his heart, the ſeventh from his belly, the eighth from his " privities, the ninth from his left thigh, the tenth from his knees, the eleventh from " his heel, the twelfth from the toes of his right foot, the thirteenth from the ſole of his " left foot, and the fourteenth from the air with which Brama is ſurrounded. They " pretend, that there is ſome affinity or relation between theſe fourteen worlds, and the " parts of Brama's body; and add, that all ſuch men as are form'd in theſe different " worlds, partake of the character and inclinations peculiar to each of them, which " they preſerve in this world as long as they live. Thus thoſe created in the firſt " world

" world are wiſe and learned, thoſe of the ſecond penetrating, thoſe of the third " eloquent, of the fourth cunning and artful, of the fifth gluttonous, of the ſixth " generous and ſplendid, of the ſeventh niggardly, &c. thoſe of the eighth are addicted " to pleaſures, particularly thoſe of love; the ninth are laborious, the tenth country " people and ruſticks, the eleventh conſiſt of the dregs of the people, and are employ'd " in the loweſt offices, the twelfth infamous wretches and vile raſcals, the thirteenth " are unjuſt and mercileſs wretches, the fourteenth are ingenious and dextrous people." On theſe principles the Bramins ground all the rules of phyſiognomy, and think that they, by looking on a perſon's face, can tell the particular world from whence he came originally; after which, they boldly pronounce the character and inclinations of the perſon whoſe face they have thus examin'd.

Altho' the theology of the Indians be very much confus'd, 'tis nevertheleſs manifeſt that they aſcribe to Brama, the [a] direction of the fate of mankind, and the deſtiny of the world, the diſpoſal of events, and their various revolutions. But this is much more than they ought to aſcribe to a God, who tho' he be a creator, is nevertheleſs dependant, and a created being; ſince the Bramins relate, that he is the ſon of Quivelinga, who is no other than Priapus, or nature. But we will endeavour to make good their aſſertions: Might we not reconcile their contradictions, by ſuppoſing Brama to be providence, who, according to the ſyſtem of the eaſtern idolaters, muſt be conſider'd as the daughter of nature, which they univerſally allow to be the ſupreme being.

What we have now mention'd of Brama, obliges us to relate an ingenious fiction of the Bramins, by which we ſee the idea they have of the creation of the world, and which induces us to believe that they look [b] upon matter as the eſſence of the Deity itſelf [c]. " They tell us, the ſpider is the firſt cauſe and firſt principle of all things; that the " univerſe was produc'd by that inſect's ſpinning out its own intrails and belly, ſo that " it brought forth, firſt the elements, and ſecondly, the celeſtial globes; that it governs " all things by its wiſdom and providence; directs every thing by its conduct, and that " things are to continue in this ſtate till the end of ages, which will never happen till this " inſect ſhall have withdrawn into its body the ſeveral threads or filaments which had " iſſued out of it, when all things will be deſtroy'd, and the world no longer exiſt " but in the belly of a ſpider."

[a] Brama is often repreſented in the ſame manner as in the annex'd figure; but Della Valle gives us another deſcription of its idol, and aſſures, that he himſelf ſaw it ſo in India.

[a] Baldæus's Deſcription of Malabar.

[b] See in the following article, what the Bramins have eſtabliſh'd with regard to the bud of the world; this notion may be found to agree with that of the ſoul of the world, maintain'd by ſome antient philoſophers. The Indians think, that not only our ſouls, but thoſe of all the animated beings in nature, are portions or parts of that univerſal ſoul. They go farther; " God, ſay they, " according to Bernier, not only produc'd or drew our ſouls out of his own ſubſtance, but likewiſe every " material and corporeal being in the univerſe. Creation is nothing elſe than God's expanding his " own ſubſtance, and deſtruction no more than his contracting or drawing it again into himſelf, which at " the laſt day will be general. From all which, their doctors conclude, that there is nothing real in " whatever we imagine we ſee, hear, ſmell, taſte or touch. The whole world is no more than a kind " of dream, and a mere illuſion of fancy, inaſmuch as all this multiplicity and diverſity of things, which " we behold, are but one and the ſame thing, i. e. God himſelf. But if you ſhould ask them to explain " in what manner the Divinity is thus expanded, the dilatation and contraction of ſubſtances, all the " various modifications of nature; and how it can poſſibly be, that God, who is not corporeal, but Biapek, " a term perhaps anſwering to the word inviſible, he yet ſhould be divided into ſo many portions of bodies " and ſouls; they anſwer only by compariſons. God, ſay they, is like a boundleſs ocean, in which " ſeveral phials fill'd with water float up and down. Theſe phials, in what part ſoever they may be, " are ever on the ſame ocean, and on the ſame water; and if the phials ſhould happen to break, the " waters contain'd in them would always reunite to the whole from which they had been ſeparated. Or " elſe they will tell you, that God reſembles light, which, tho' it be the ſame in all parts of the univerſe, " does nevertheleſs vary itſelf ſeveral ways. All theſe different compariſons induce one to believe they " have very confus'd notions of theſe matters. Beſides, a man muſt underſtand their language very well, " and be able to read their books, before he can form a true judgment of their ſyſtems; extracts which " perhaps are given without any manner of connection, and diſputes or argumentations carried on by " word of mouth, cannot alone enable us to judge of the opinions of a nation, whoſe religion and " philoſophy are conceal'd under enigmas and allegorical fictions."

India. " There is, ſays he, a temple dedicated to Brama in Hagra—its ſtatue " ſtands in the midſt of the temple, among a great number of idols of white marble. " It has ſeveral arms and three faces, at leaſt I did not ſee any more, it being impoſſible " for me to diſcern whether there were a fourth, or more behind it. This ſtatue has " not the leaſt drapery about it, and is repreſented with a long, ſharp, but ill-ſhap'd " beard, like all the reſt of the figure, which has too prominent a belly in proportion to " its height. This defect ſhould poſſibly be aſcrib'd to the ignorance of the ſculptor, " unleſs we are to conſider it as a caprice of the Indians, who perhaps, with the people " of Sumatra, think that the moſt gor-belly'd people are the beſt ſhap'd. This ſtatue " of Brama ſtands upright; at its feet are two other ſmall ſtatues, repreſenting his " children; and on both ſides of it two images of women, a little leſs than Brama, one " to the right, and the other to the leſt, repreſenting this God's two wives. In another " corner of the pagod, to the leſt of Brama, two nudities are placed, repreſenting " bearded men, which are almoſt of the ſame height. The laſt figures repreſent two " religious, who were formerly Brama's diſciples."

IXORA.

We are not to confound Ixora, who is the ſame as Eſwara, with Ixoretta, who, according to Baldæus, author of a valuable deſcription of Malabar, and of Coromandel, is properly the bud of the world. Some idolatrous doctors, according to Baldæus, affirm, that one day the univerſe dwindled away in ſo extraordinary a manner, that there remain'd only Ixoretta, who exiſted in the ſhape of a drop of dew; but that Ixoretta in proceſs of time recover'd all his ſtrength; that this bud was at firſt no bigger than a grain of muſtard-ſeed, but afterwards ſwell'd to the bigneſs of a pearl, when laſtly it became like an egg, in which, five elements were contain'd: The egg was cover'd with ſeven coats, like to thoſe of an onion, whence fire and air iſſued. From the egg, divided into two unequal portions, the heaven and earth were form'd; and the ſeven coats were divided in the ſame manner: of the upper part of it ſeven heavens were form'd, and of the lower ſeven worlds. Nevertheleſs, a thread or ſtring, which cuts the egg diametrically thro' the center, united together, in ſome meaſure, all theſe ſeveral parts. Ixoretta plac'd himſelf on he top of the ſtring. A mountain was made on the earth, on the top of which there appear'd a triangular figure, having a round thing in the middle, which they call Quivelinga. Theſe two figures repreſent the two ſexes. They add, that Ixoretta and Quivelinga are one and the ſame thing, and their opinion is grounded on the near relation they bear one to the other. See hereafter Lingam. 'Tis very probable, that the Bramins may have borrow'd the emblem of the egg, by which they repreſent the world, from the Egyptians; but we may obſerve a conſiderable difference between the two ſyſtems. The Egyptians, in repreſenting the creator of the univerſe with an egg iſſuing out of his mouth, did not confound the artiſt with his work; whereas it does not appear, according to the principles of the Bramins, that they are diſtinct one from the other. In ſhort, nothing can be more ſilly or trifling, than the principles which a man pretends to demonſtrate as clear and certain, when in the eſtabliſhing them, he follows no other guide than [a] his imaginations. In the whole, it wou'd not perhaps be impoſſible, to reconcile this imaginary bud, which the Indians call Ixoretta, with that ſpirit, which according to Moſes, mov'd upon the face of the waters.

[b] The head of Ixora is adorn'd with long and beautiful hair, his face is white and ſhining, and a creſcent is repreſented on his head; his three eyes denote the extent of his foreſight and penetration. Altho' we have here repreſented him under a figure, which ſeems to take up no great ſpace, yet the Bramins aſſure he is infinite. One day Brama being deſirous of ſeeing Ixora's head, he for that purpoſe took his flight towards heaven, heaven, but in ſpight of all his endeavours, he was not ſuffer'd to gratify his deſires. On the other ſide, Viſtnou, the God of metamorphoſes or changes, endeavour'd to pierce through to that place where Ixora's feet ſtood: in order to ſucceed in this attempt, he transform'd himſelf into a hog, and made a great hole in the ground with his ſnout; but in vain he endeavour'd to puſh forward, for his ſnout could never reach to the place where the feet of the God were. The body of Ixora is ſo prodigiouſly bulky, that the ſerpent Baltegu, who ſurrounds ſeven worlds, and as many ſeas, was not long enough to ſerve him as a bracelet. An idolater, who knew more of that matter than the reſt, reproach'd a Bramin in the moſt injurious terms, for maintaining, that 'twas poſſible for Ixora to be comprehended in a pagod.

Ixora is repreſented ſtanding on a pedeſtal, with ſixteen arms, each arm of which graſps ſomething; thoſe of the right arms hold fire, ſilver, a drum, a pair of beads, a rope, a ſtick, a wheel, and a ſerpent; thoſe of the left a heart, a muſical inſtrument, a bell, a china bowl, a chain, a Bramin's head, a trident, and an ax or hatchet. By theſe ſixteen arms, the power and ſtrength of God are repreſented. He has an elephant's skin over his ſhoulders, and is likewiſe cloath'd in a tyger's skin, whoſe ſpots repreſent the ſtars in the firmament. He is ſurrounded with a great many ſerpents, which poſſibly the Indians, as the Egyptians antiently, have made the emblem of the revolution of ages. He wears a necklace, at which a little bell hangs; denoting Ixora's vigilance; this necklace is made of the skin of an animal, call'd by the Indians Mandega; he has another necklace ſet off with flowers, beſides the above-mention'd; and a third, gamiſh'd with [a] ſeveral heads of Brama; and a fourth, to which the bones of Chatti, Ixora's wife, are ty'd. The theology of the Bramins of Malabar, and of Coromandel, relate, that this God has two wives; viz. Chatti Grienga his dearly beloved, and inſeparable conſort, who reſides behind him, and conceals herſelf in his hair; [c] as for Chatti his other wife, ſhe dies, and comes to life annually, in the ſame manner as Brama; and Ixora, every time ſhe dies, takes her bones, and ties them to his fourth necklace. We muſt not omit, that the body of this Deity is ſmear'd over with earth and aſhes, to denote generation and deſtruction.

From what was juſt now obſerv'd, 'tis pretty manifeſt, that Ixora is the matter, which ſeveral philoſophers ancient and modern, ſuppos'd to be infinite and eternal, and that it is commonly confounded with a firſt cauſe, infinitely ſuperior to matter, and its ſovereign mover. Poſſibly this croud of Gods ador'd by the Eaſt-Indians, may be compos'd only of Genii, (a ſet of ſpirits ſubordinate to the ſovereign God) of kings, and great men, who for their glorious actions were rank'd among the Gods. "Several learned men, "ſays Father la Lame, in a [b] letter of his written to Father Morgues, are agreed, that "there can be but one God, who is a pure ſpirit; but they ſay farther, that Chiven, "Vichnou, and the reſt are, his miniſters or agents, and that 'tis by their mediation we "approach the throne of the Deity, and receive bleſſings from thence." All we can ſay, is, that their practice would not induce us to think they believ'd but in one God only: However, theſe are not the only people, who, in religious matters, deſtroy by their practice what they admit in ſpeculation. As to what relates to the worſhip of the ſtatues of thoſe Gods, they fairly own, if Bernier may be credited, that they believe them to be only ſo many images and repreſentations. "We pay them honour, ſay they, "merely for the ſake of thoſe they repreſent; they are lodg'd in our pagods, becauſe it "is neceſſary, for the better offering up of our prayers in them, that ſome ſuch object "ſhould ſtrike the eye, in order to fix the attention; and when we pray, we don't "addreſs ourſelves to the ſtatue, but to him repreſented by it: in a word, we look upon "God as the abſolute maſter, and the ſole almighty power." Bernier adds, that this appear'd to him ſomething after the Chriſtian way of thinking.

P U D A,

[a] Brama, according to the Bramins, dies and revives annually. Every time he dies, Ixora takes one of his heads, and ties it to her necklace.

PUDA, the PEXAIOS, &c.

They aſſociate to Ixora certain Deities, whom the Malabarians, and the reſt of the Indian idolaters call by the names of Puda, Pexaios, and Pés. Puda is repreſented under the ſhape of a ſquat, thick, gor-bellied, beardleſs man, with three ſerpents over his head. He has one ſerpent upon his leſt arm in the form of a ring, and two upon his thighs, and a ſhepherd's crook is ſeen in his leſt hand. The Pexaios and Pés are larger, and wrought with greater skill than Puda: All of them bear ſome relation to the rural Gods of the antient heathens. In fine, if the reader will give himſelf the trouble to compare theſe explications with the Diſſertation on the manners and the religion of the Bramins, he will meet with ſeveral things of the ſame nature, expreſs'd under different names, and frequently mix'd with ſuch ideas as have no manner of connection. This imperfection ariſes from the confuſion, which is found in the Indian theology; and the obſcurity with which travellers have clouded it, for want of knowing how to diſtinguiſh the opinions of the ſeveral ſects one from the other. An Indian, who ſhould write on the Chriſtian Religion, would make an odd kind of rhapſody, were he to confound the various opinions of Anabaptiſts, Lutherans, Quakers, Calviniſts, and Roman Catholicks; and ſhould not only heighten them with the myſtical and allegorical deſcriptions of the divines of theſe different ſects; but interlard his work with ſtories out of the antient and modern legends.

QUENAVADY.

Quenavady is ſeated on a throne behind a curtain, which is drawn back, whenever any devotee comes to pay homage to him; this God is the eldeſt ſon of Ixora: He is repreſented with the head, the teeth, and trunk of an elephant, with a creſcent on the crown of his head; he has long hair, large eyes, broad ears, red ſpots on his face, if we may ſo call it when we ſpeak of an elephant; but the reſt of the body, which gliſters like gold, is of an human ſhape. He has four arms, and a prodigious wide and prominent belly; his loins are girded either with a piece of ſtuff or painted linnen, which hanging down before on his thighs, is tied under the navel. He has ſeveral gold rings on his feet; in one of his hands he holds a Diſcus or quoit, in another a long ſtaff, in the third an inſtrument made in the ſhape of a porrenger, and in the fourth a kind of ſtring. Ixora begot Quenavady, in a ſolitude to which he had baniſh'd himſelf for having cut off one of Brama's heads; and the reaſon why that created Deity reſembles an elephant, is, becauſe his parents metamorphos'd themſelves into thoſe creatures, when they begot him: This transformation was made in the midſt of a wood, and the offspring of their commerce was tainted with the brutiſh fierceneſs of wild beaſts. He was as yet but very young, when he one day had the impudence to thruſt his trunk under his mother's petticoats, as ſhe was holding him in her arms; nay, ſome Indian doctors aſſure, that he did ſomething worſe. The father provok'd at his ſon's inſolence, employ'd an expedient, which prov d of great ſervice to his honour, for he lopp'd Quenavady in ſuch a manner, as made it impoſſible for him to divert himſelf any more in the amorous way.

The Indian doctors repreſent Quenavady as an inſatiable Deity, who devours every thing that is ſet before him. They relate, that he dwells in the midſt of a ſea of ſugar in a delicious place, where riches and pleaſure flow with uninterrupted abundance, ſo that the ſenſes may there riot in whatever they can poſſibly luſt after. 'Tis here Quenavady eats, or rather devours perpetually his victuals. Two women who ſtand by his ſide, are inceſſantly throwing ſugar down his throat with very large ſpoons; and leſt the uniformity of the viands ſhould create a loathing in the God, he has round him ſeveral other dainties, and a prodigious quantity of all ſorts of fruit. Quenavady's taſte ſeems to agree very well with that of the age.

'Tis to this God the Indians offer the firſt-fruits of their works; authors ſet his name at the head of their writings; artificers and trades-people of all kinds, invoke his name before they engage in any work ſoever. The Indians ſay, that a man muſt ſerve Quenavady ſix and thirty years, before he can obtain any thing he prays for; at the end of twelve years he moves his right ear, tho' almoſt imperceptibly, which ſignifies, that he requires ſtill twelve years more worſhip; after which, he moves his left ear, to denote they muſt ſerve him the remaining twelve years with the utmoſt ſtrictneſs.

The fourth of the moon of Auguſt is a very unlucky day, in the opinion of the Indians of Coromandel and Malabar, becauſe of the curſe which Quenavady utter'd in his anger againſt the moon, for laughing at him one day when he happen'd to fall down. The choleric God proteſted, that whoever ſhould preſume to look on the moon that day, ſhould fall into great misfortunes, and be cut off from his Caſte. The idolaters, becauſe of this curſe, confine themſelves in their houſes the fourth of the moon of Auguſt; when they neither undertake the moſt inconſiderable affair without doors, or once look into the water, for fear of ſeeing the reflection of the moon in it. In fine, if they chance to be ſo unlucky, as to be out upon a journey in this ſeaſon, they are ſure to cover their faces very cloſe.

Ixora has other children, who go by the name of Quenavady. That ſurnam'd Iſagouraba is repreſented with an elephant's head and eleven arms. Another Quenavady, ſurnam'd Ceuxi, came into the world under a compleatly human ſhape, and was generated from the ſweat of Parameſceri, Ixora's wife. He was full grown at the moment of his birth; the jealous Ixora miſtook the new-born child for his wife's gallant, and without enquiring into the affair cut off its head, whence there ſprung a cocao tree. Parameſceri was afflicted at the rage of her jealous husband, and for the death of her ſon, who was the miraculous product of her ſweat, and made heavy complaints upon that account. Ixora, on the other ſide, confeſs'd his fault, cut off a white elephant's head, and graſted it, while 'twas juſt reeking from the body, upon that of the dead Ceuxi, whom he reſtor'd to life at the ſame inſtant, to conſole the diſconſolate Parameſceri. [a] Siri-Hanuman, or Hanuuvan, call'd Anemonta, in the Diſſertation on the cuſtoms and the religion of the Bramins, was ſon to Ixora and Parameſceri. His mother occaſion'd his coming into the world under the ſhape of an ape, which was in the following manner. [b] One day Parameſceri went to a ball with her husband: as ſhe was dancing, ſhe happen'd to caſt her eyes on a wood, where ſhe perceiv'd two apes, who were ſporting together in ſo melting a manner, that ſhe immediately reſolv'd to leave the ball, and run up and down the woods under the ſhape of that animal. She did not intend to continue idle there, having been too much affected with the pleaſures, in which ſhe had ſeen the apes indulge themſelves, not to follow their example: Ixora was therefore oblig'd to follow her into the woods, when the complaiſant God transform'd himſelf into an ape, after which they climb'd gently up the trees, jump'd from branch to branch, approach'd one another, began to play little roguiſh tricks, and, in ſhort, at laſt went to thoſe lengths, that Siri-Hanuman was got between them. However, Parameſceri reflecting ſeriouſly afterwards on what ſhe had done, was aſham'd to ſee herſelf juſt upon the point of bringing forth an ape; ſhe beſought the wind to rid her of a monſtrous child, of which ſhe was going to be deliver'd, and to convey it to ſome other woman. The wind obſequious at her requeſt, carried the child into the womb of the wife of a Genius, and the child was brought forth in due time. His father Ixora indulg'd him the privilege of doing whatever he pleas'd during three hours and three quarters every day. This Ape-God is had in great veneration by the Indians, a pompous worſhip is paid him, and the pagods in which he is ador'd are adorn'd with the utmoſt magnificence. When the Portugueze, in 1554, made a deſcent upon the iſland of Ceylan, they plunder'd the temple of the ape's tooth, made themſelves maſters of immenſe riches, and carried off this precious relick, the object of the religious worſhip of the inhabitants of Ceylan, Pegu, Malabar, Bengal, &c. The ſhrine in which this relick was depoſited, was cover'd with jewels, and they took care not to forget it; an Indian prince offer'd the viceroy of Goa ſeven hundred thouſand ducats of gold to redeem this ſacred tooth, but his propoſal was rejected.

Superbenia is alſo number'd among Ixora's children, but he ow'd his birth to the infidelity of Parameſceri. Here follows the hiſtory of the birth of that illegitimate God, who has ſix faces and twelve arms. Our hopefulGoddeſs beingone day alone in the bath, and undreſs'd without doubt, was obſerv'd by ſix jolly weavers, whoſe ſtature and countenance promis'd wonders. Parameſceri was charm'd with what ſhe ſaw, while on the other hand, our weavers were not inform'd with hearts of ſtone. The lady was beautiful and piercing, the weavers young and active; in a word, 'twas plain both parties were reciprocally ſtruck, and—ſomething more enſued: the ſix gallants and the Goddeſs made quick work of it, and a boy with ſix faces and twelve arms ſprung from this intrigue. The child being grown up, was agreeable in Ixora's eyes, who own'd it for his, becauſe of his wit.

Patragali, daughter of Ixora, was born from a running, with which Wiſtnou was troubled, which entring into Ixora's body, iſſued afterwards by the eye of fire, which the latter has in his forehead; this running falling down on the earth, gave birth to Patragali, a very monſtrous Deity, who is black as an Ethiopian; ſhe has ſixteen arms and eight faces, large round eyes, the teeth of a hog, and an elephant hanging on each ſide of her head, in the manner of ear-rings; a peacock's tail inſtead of hair, and ſerpents inſtead of cloaths. In her hands ſhe holds a ſword, a ſea-ſnail, a trident, a kind of little ciſtern, call'd by the Malabarians Capala, a crooked ſword, a ſmall ſabre, an engine to liſt up burthens, a Zagaye or Mooriſh dart, a javelin, a rope, an ape, a wheel, and an iron inſtrument with three hooks. This monſter was ſent into the world, to revenge the inſulted Ixora upon Darida, who was a very inſolent giant. The idolaters believing that Patragali afflicts with the ſmall-pox, and alſo cures it, devote to her all ſuch as labour under that diſeaſe; the patient is committed to the care of certain perſons who have devoted themſelves to the ſervice of that Divinity, and theſe devotees endeavour to make her propitious, by ſacrifices and offerings accompanied with vows and prayers. They cut off the heads of ſeveral cocks, and throw their blood to the dogs; they feed their ſick with rice boil'd in water; but we are aſſur'd they often give the poor patients a liſt into the other world, when they find they are able to bequeath them a handſome legacy. 'Tis well known that among us a devotee covets nothing more than an eſtate; and that many a man edifies good ſouls by his prayers, who at the ſame time often waits with impatience for the death of ſome antiquated widow, in order to ſucceed to her eſtate, or of ſome old ſinner who pretends to reſtore to God what he has ſtole from men in his life-time. Patragali is one of thoſe deities whom they worſhip thro' fear, who has a magnificent pagod erected to her at Cranganor, whither the devout Indians often go in pilgrimage. The Indian doctors relate, that this Goddeſs was married, but that ſhe would never ſuffer her virgin flower to be cropt.

WISTNOU, WICHNU, or WISTNUM.

This God, who is ſon to Quivelinga, is inferior to Ixora; he is often repreſented under a hideous ſhape, as black as a negro, and with four arms. This God governs the world, and reſides in the ſea of ſugar; but a very whimſical circumſtance is, that he there ſpends his whole time in ſleeping, and yet directs the affairs of the univerſe; he uſes the ſerpent Annatan for a throne, and its five heads ſerve as ſo many cuſhions on which the ſleeping God repoſes himſelf. We ſhall obſerve by the by, that the Indian Deities are generally attended with ſerpents. The inhabitants of theſe countries believe thoſe animals to be ſo many celeſtial Genii, and 'tis a lucky omen to meet a ſerpent in one's way.

The God Viſtnou has on his breaſt the mark of a kick, which Ricxi, who was originally a Genius of India, gave him one day as he was in a deep ſleep. Leximi and Siri Pagoda are look'd upon as his wives, the latter of whom he met with in a roſe which had a thouſand leaves.

The ten INCARNATIONS, or METAMORPHOSES of VISTNOU.

[a] Viſtnou has already metamorphos'd himſelf nine times in this world, and is to undergo a tenth transformation. Theſe metamorphoſes comprehend all the myſtery of the Indian theology; he firſt aſſum'd the ſhape of a fiſh, in order to ſearch for the Vedam at the bottom of the ſea, whither it had been carried by an evil Genius, who had forc'd it away from the Deutas. Viſtnou, at the urgent requeſt of the Deutas, plung'd into the ſea, kill'd this evil Genius, and return'd with the Vedam, which he found in a ſhell: The figure repreſents Viſtnou coming out of the fiſh, whoſe form he had aſſum'd; his two right hands hold the Vedam open, and a ring; his two left, a ſabre, and the ſhell in which the Vedam was incloſ'd; the monſter is ſeen headleſs at his feet. On the other ſide, the Malabarians aſcribe to Brama part of what the other Indians attribute to Viſtnou, and affirm, that the evil Genius took the Vedam from him, that Brama complain'd thereof to Viſtnou, and implor'd his aſſiſtance. Brama is repreſented in the figure ſitting on an Indian flower.

Second INCARNATION.

The ſecond metamorphoſis of Viſtnou was into a tortoiſe. One day the ſea being elated with pride, preſum'd to give an inſolent account of its power and riches. Brama, accompanied with certain demons, was order'd to puniſh this element for its inſolence; accordingly they took up the mountain of Merupa, which is all of maſſy gold, and plac'd it in the midſt of the ſea; they wound the ſerpent Signag, or Sciſſia, as the Bramins call it, ſeveral times round this mountain; then uſing this ſerpent as a cable, they lifted up the mountain, and afterwards let it fall again, till they at laſt forc'd this haughty element to reſtore all the wealth which had made it ſo proud. The ſea was forc'd to throw up again the following things; viz. ſilver, a very precious jewel, the tree Parſatig, a veſſel in which the water call'd Sora was contain'd, Dannewanter the Indian Eſculapius, the moon, the white cow, the Amarith or water of eternal life; the elephant with ſeven trunks, the virgin Remba, the ſeven-headed horſe, the bow call'd Dennock, a ſhell call'd Sank, and the poiſon Sahar. Thus was the ſea humbled, all its wealth was diſtributed up and down in different places, when the expedition being ended, Brama re-aſcended into heaven.

Some Indian doctors ſay, that the earth unable to ſupport the weight of the mountain Merupa, was juſt going to the bottom of the abyſs, when Viſtnou, who had aſſum'd the ſhape of a tortoiſe, took the mountain on his back.

Third INCARNATION.

A powerful Genius, Renniaxem by name, took the earth one day, and roul'd it in his hand like a bowl; but not ſatisfy'd with having thus far try'd his skill, and imagining himſelf to be peaceable poſſeſſor of the terreſtrial globe, he went and hid himſelf in Patalam, which is the bottom of the abyſs. Viſtnou, who was aſleep at the inſtant when he took his flight, awaking on a ſudden, was ſurpriz'd to ſee the earth was gone; upon which, he immediately transform'd himſelf into a hog, pierc'd as far as Patalam

[a] The foregoing diſſertation relates theſe transformations after a very different manner; after this explication, we ſhall preſent the reader with Father Roth's account, who differs from both.

Patalam by the help of his ſnout, arm'd with two monſtrous tuſhes, attacks the thief, kills him, and then laying the earth on his tusks, return'd from the abyſs with this important conqueſt. Baldæus in his deſcription of Coromandel relates, that in a pagod of Trimottam near Sinzi, is the head of a hog, which, if the Bramins are to be credited, grew in the earth like a truffle; 'tis conſider'd as an image, or rather a memorable relick of the metamorphoſis of Wiſtnou.

The heathens of Mogul aſcribe this metamorphoſis to another cauſe. They relate, that mankind in the firſt age degenerated ſo abominably, that all faith and law were baniſh'd from the univerſe; then iniquity was multiplied, the ſins of mankind increas'd the weight of the earth, ſo that the ſerpent Seiſſia, on which it lay, was no longer able to ſupport it; whereupon it fell to the bottom of the ſea, and all mankind were deſtroy'd. Brama beſought God that the earth might again return upon the waters, and his requeſt was granted. Wiſtnou deſcended from the heavens under the figure of a hog, in the manner repreſented in this figure, and under that form ſwell'd to ſuch a prodigious ſize, that his head touch'd the ſtars. He then went down into Patalam, where he defeated Hirnak, a monſtrous devil; after which, mounting on the carcaſs of this dead monſter, he hook'd the earth to him, and rais'd it with his tuſhes, after having plac'd it on the tortoiſe which lay on the ſerpent Signag, who, according to the Indian doctors, has a thouſand heads. After this, Brama again repeopled the earth with new men, whom he created with a ſingle word.

The engraver copied the figure of the third incarnation, from a Deſign in which there is neither a tortoiſe nor a ſerpent.

Fourth INCARNATION.

Brama, in the firſt age, ſubdued the giant or devil call'd by the Indians Hirrenkeſſep, and kept him in a very tedious and ſevere confinement. After he had thus ſuffer'd for twelve years, the giant implor'd the mercy of Brama, who taking pity on this unhappy wretch, indulg'd him moſt uncommon favours; for he releas'd him out of priſon, made him a powerful monarch; and to aſſure him he ſhould continue to live, he granted him the following privilege; viz. that it ſhould be impoſſible for him to die, unleſs in the moſt extraordinary and uncommon manner. Hirrenkeſſep was hereby ſecur'd from the inſults of the heaven, the earth, the ſun, the moon, thunder, lightning, the day, the night, the wind, ſtorms, and ſuch like accidents, which we ſhall not enumerate. The giant having recover'd his liberty, rais'd ſeveral armies, and made ſuch rapid conqueſts, that he ſoon became the terror of the univerſe. But now the ſoft gales of proſperity ſwell'd his heart, and he carried his inſolence to ſuch a pitch, that forgetting who he was, he commanded that himſelf only ſhould be ador'd as God. The Bramins oppos'd this impious worſhip, and beſought Wiſtnou to deliver them from the tyranny with which they were oppreſs'd. Wiſtnou aſſur'd them, that the wife of this tyrant ſhould bring forth a child who ſhould free them from his uſurpation. Wiſtnou's promiſe was fulfill'd, the giant became the father of a ſon, whom he would have brought up in the worſhip of himſelf only; but the babe, ſo far from owning him to be God, made a ſolemn confeſſion of his faith, by which he acknowledg'd Wiſtnou as creator of the fourteen worlds, and father of truth, &c. The tyrant highly incens'd, treated this little martyr to the Bramin faith very inhumanly, and was going to knock him down with his ſtaff, when the child eſcap'd the blow, by hiding himſelf behind a pillar, which receiv'd the ſtroke, and immediately ſplit in two, when lo! a dreadful monſter iſſued out of it; Wiſtnou had aſſum'd that ſhape purpoſely to chaſtiſe the inſolence of this tyrant. The metamorphos'd God ſeiz'd the giant by the middle, and torehim to pieces.

Fifth INCARNATION.

[a] In the time that Mavaly govern'd the world, i. e. during the golden age of the Indians, there was a wonderful profusion of all things, so that no one would work; no subordination was to be seen, every thing was in common, and a man needed only put forth his hand to take whatever he wanted; but what was the result of this dangerous abundance? every man was oblig'd to depend entirely upon himself, and not rely on the least foreign assistance, and that because interest, which in general unites mankind together, had not yet got possession of their hearts. The worst was, there was very little devotion to be met with in the world, for necessity, the great motive for prayer, was as yet unknown. Wistnou, desirous of putting a stop to a circumstance, which might be attended with very ill consequences, resolv'd therefore to dethrone Mavaly, and to bring want, hunger, misery and poverty into the world: To succeed in his attempt, he employ'd artifice, and assuming the shape of a poor Bramin, presented himself to Mavaly as a beggar craving alms. Mavaly offer'd him kingdoms and treasures, to which the Bramin answer'd, that he begg'd only three foot of ground for himself to inhabit with his baggage, consisting in an umbrello, a book of devotion after the Bramin worship, and a goblet. The reader is to observe, that the furniture of a Bramin consists only in these three particulars. He requir'd at the same time, that for the more solemn ratification of his right to this ground, Mavaly should pour [b] water into his hand. The latter surpriz'd at the Bramin's modesty, was long urgent with him, but in vain, to accept of such advantages, as in all outward appearance, were infinitely greater than the three foot of ground he requested. However, as he was just going to bestow the three foot of ground on the Bramin, Mavaly's wife suspecting some trick, strongly oppos'd the grant; but Mavaly refus'd to forswear himself, and taking the vessel, in which the water appointed for the fatal ratification was contain'd, he pour'd some of it into the Bramin's hand, who drank it off; when immediately resuming his Divinity, he cover'd the earth with one foot, and heaven with the other: after which, going to appropriate to himself the rest of the ground which the unhappy Mavaly had then granted him, he set his foot upon his throat, and knock'd him backwards into the abyss, which he measur'd at the same time. The husband and wife being thus dethron'd by an artifice so unworthy Wistnou, made heavy complaints to him upon that account, when the God mov'd with his complaints, restor'd Mavaly king of the abyss. Some Indian doctors assure, that Wistnou made him door-keeper of heaven; be that as it will, ever since this revolution, riches and poverty, abundance and misery, prosperity and adversity, the natural result of the inequality of conditions, have alternately prevail'd in the world: but Wistnou, in order to transmit to posterity a type of the felicity which mankind enjoy'd under the reign of Mavaly, instituted a festival call'd by the Malabarians, Ona, and by them celebrated in the month of August; 'tis a kind of bacchanal, during which the Indians of all ranks and conditions dress themselves as richly as their circumstances will possibly allow, feast one another to the best of their abilities, and spend that season in joy and festivity.

Sixth INCARNATION.

A Bramin, who was a very good man, having married a very virtuous She-Bramin, withdrew with his wife to the banks of a river, call'd by the Indian legends Bewa. They pitch'd upon this place for their fix'd habitation, and resolv'd there to spend their days in devotion. In this calm state, there was one circumstance wanting to compleat their happiness, and that was children, the Bramin's wife not bringing him any. The Banians

[a] This metamorphosis is related after a very different manner, in the Dissertation on the manners and religion of the Bramins, Ch. 15. of the second part.

[b] Whenever the Indian idolaters transact any affair, the contract is ratified by pouring water into the hand of the purchaser, who is oblig'd to drink it. Baldæus's description of Coromandel.

Banians look upon ſuch nuptials as diſhonourable, which are not crown'd with children. Our pious pair, inconſolable at the reproach which was caſt upon them, reſolv'd to withdraw to the deſart, there to implore, with greater fervency than ever, the bleſſing of heaven, in order that they might have children; and for this purpoſe were reſolv'd to make choice of ſome remote and unfrequented place. Our couple, after having long wandered through the fields, at laſt arriv'd at a pagod ſituated in the midſt of a little, but very agreeable grove. Here they offer'd up very long prayers to God, but to no effect; which made them conclude, that the beauty of the place was the ſole cauſe of his rejecting them. Hereupon they reſolv'd to ſee whether they could not mollify him in the plains, and to continue, for that purpoſe, always expos'd to the burning rays of the ſun, and the inclemencies of the air; but ſtill this rigorous penance avail'd them nothing. At laſt, they made a reſolution to ſuffer the extremes of hunger, till ſuch time as it ſhould pleaſe God, either to hear their prayers, or put an end to their lives. For nine days together they underwent this rigorous tryal; after which, Viſtnou appear'd to them under the ſhape of a beautiful child, and ask'd them the occaſion of theſe repeated auſterities. They ſatisfy'd his demand, upon which, Viſtnou revealing himſelf, promis'd them three children, and vaniſh'd away in an inſtant; two of theſe three children were produc'd by tranſmigration; the ſouls of the Bramin and his wife, whom a too ſevere abſtinence, and an over-violent affliction, had brought to their graves, tranſmigrated into the bodies of two new-born children; theſe afterwards grew up, married together, and gave birth to a child, the laſt fruit of Viſtnou's promiſe. The father, according to the legend, was call'd Sandichemi, the mother Reneka, and the child Praſſeram; Reneka had a ſiſter that was married to a giant who had a thouſand arms.

The old Bramin and his wife, being again return'd upon the earth, under the names of Sandicheni and Reneka, were as pious as before; and in order to purſue their inclinations with greater liberty, they built themſelves a little hutt near the Ganges, where they ſubſiſted, but poorly enough, on the fruits of the earth: They here gave themſelves up entirely to devotion and prayer, and even regretted the time they were oblig'd to allow to the moſt urgent neceſſities of nature. By this means they attain'd the moſt ſublime perfection of holineſs; inſomuch, that their legend aſſures, they rais'd the dead. Praſſeram inherited her parents virtues, and was capable of giving the moſt wiſe and prudent inſtructions, in an age when others are ſcarce able to underſtand them: But an accident, with an abſtract whereof we ſhall preſent the reader, interrupted the piety, which ſhone with ſo much luſtre in this cottage. Viſtnou had given Reneka a handkerchief, which had the property of receiving water into it, without letting any run thro'. Unhappily for Reneka, her ſiſter appear'd with all the pomp of a queen, at a time when ſhe was going to draw water. Reneka complain'd of the great diſparity of their conditions, and her uneaſineſs deſtroy'd the handkerchief's quality; but now the holineſs of our Bramin was not proof againſt the emotions of rage, which was ſo violent, that he caus'd Reneka to be kill'd by her own ſon; but his fury being afterwards calm'd, he rais'd her from the dead at the preſſing inſtances of the child above-mention'd.

Some time after, the giant with a thouſand arms, attended by his whole court, went to make a viſit to Sandichemi his brother-in-law, whoſe circumſtances not permitting him to pay him ſuch honours, as a monarch of his quality might juſtly claim, he beſought the king of the bleſſed ſouls to ſend him the white cow for ſome time. According to the Indian legend, whoever has that cow, wants for nothing. The Bramin, by the aſſiſtance of this cow, gave the giant and his court, a moſt ſplendid reception, and preſented him with a great number of precious ſtones. The thouſand-arm'd giant no ſooner found, that Sandichemi ow'd all his riches to the white cow, but he reſolv'd to carry her off; but, ſhe eſcap'd out of his hands, and ſoaring up into the air, return'd to the king of the bleſſed ſouls: However, it coſt Sandichemi his life, whom the giant kill'd; but Praſſeram reveng'd her father's death, put the giant to death, and cut off all his arms.

The

The Malabarians relate this incarnation differently; according to these, the Rixis unable to live any longer under the tyrannical yoke of certain Raias, implor'd Wiſtnou's aſſiſtance in the moſt urgent manner. Wiſtnou having firſt chang'd himſelf into a little child, hid himſelf in the ſacrifice of one of the chief Rixis, and commanded Parexi-Rama to cut to pieces with an ax, forty-four of thoſe Raias, who tyranniz'd over the Rixis. Some time after, Parexi-Rama deſirous of building pagods, but not finding ground enough for his purpoſe, becauſe the ſea in thoſe days touch'd the mountains Gates, he took up a winnowing fan, and ſhaking it thrice, made it retire as many times. He would have forc'd it ſtill further, had not the God of the waters, offended at his boldneſs, taken proper meaſures to check his progreſs, by ſending for all the ants in his dominions, and commanding them to gnaw the fan which was employ'd to contract the bounds of his empire. Parexi-Rama could not therefore raiſe more than an hundred and eight pagods, but would have erected more, had he not been prevented by the affront which the God of the waters put upon him. On the other ſide, the fiſhermen being entirely ruin'd by the ſea's being remov'd to ſo great diſtance from them, repreſented to Parexi-Rama their miſerable condition; when he, being deſirous of indemniſying them in an ample manner, made them Bramins, and aſſign'd them the revenues of the pagods for their ſubſiſtence. We may here obſerve ſome footſteps of the hiſtory of the Apoſtles, whom God rais'd from the low eſtate of fiſhermen, to be the preachers of his Goſpel. Parexi-Rama commanded theſe new Bramins to wear a kind of ſtring, by which, their priſtine condition is repreſented; and moreover, 'tis from the abovemention'd circumſtance, that the Bramins have borrow'd the cuſtom of obliging the new-married man to go a fiſhing with his bride.

Seventh INCARNATION.

Here follows the ſubject of this transformation according to [a] Baldæus. One Rawana, born a Bramin, had formerly an extraordinary devotion for Ixora, to whom he daily offer'd an hundred flowers. The God Ixora being one day deſirous of making a tryal of his faith, ſtole one of them away, and afterwards complain'd that the oblation was leſs than uſual. Rawana counted the flowers, and finding but ninety-nine, was immediately for plucking out one of his eyes to make up the deficiency. Ixora ſatisfy'd with this pledge of his fidelity, would not ſuffer him to do it, and as an acknowledgment, offer'd to grant him whatever he ſhould requeſt. The Bramin deſir'd, that the government of the world might be committed to him, which was granted. In the mean time, Rawana continued his devout exerciſes; and his prayers, tho' they were frequent, were yet very ſelfiſh: upon which, Ixora ſpake to him as follows; "As I have indulg'd thee "all thou demandeſt of me, why doſt thou ſtill continue to addreſs me in prayer? what "is it, thou now wanteſt with me?" I have one thing more to requeſt of thee, ſays the importunate Rawana, and that is, to give me ten heads, wherewith to govern this univerſe, which thou haſt given me, and to ſurvey all things in it, with my own eyes, and twenty arms to exerciſe my power therein. Ixora granted him alſo this requeſt; after which, Rawana fix'd upon Lanca for the place of his reſidence, and fortified himſelf very ſtrongly in it; when, after a long and prudent reign, he forgot all his obligations to Ixora, and would have oblig'd his ſubjects to acknowledge himſelf only for God. Upon this, Wiſtnou aſſum'd an human ſhape, and came upon the earth under the name of Ram, (the wife of a Raia bringing him into the world) to chaſtize Rawana's inſolence. Ram perform'd ſeveral wonderful exploits, which we ſhall not trouble the reader with, as ſurprizing as thoſe which are related of the fairies. All we ſhall obſerve, is, that he directed an arrow more skilfully than 'tis poſſible for man to do: he firſt kill'd Rawana, who had metamorphos'd himſelf into a ſtag; but the ſoul of the the cunning Rawana immediately quitted the ſtag, and went and ſhot itſelf into the body of a Faquir. In this new diſguiſe he play'd Ram a true Faquir's trick, by carrying off his wife Sitha; but Hanuman the Ape-God reveng'd the affront, which Eſwara, transform'd into this mock-devotee, had put upon Ram. The ape made a dreadful havock in Lanca; nor were Rawana, or the giants his ſubjects, able to put a ſtop to it: and when they, by the virtue of certain magical words, had at laſt found out the ſecret of taking [a] Hanuman priſoner, they nevertheleſs could not put him to death, becauſe of the continual ſuccour which Ram afforded him. Rawana ask'd the ape by what means his ſtrength might be ſubdued; but the ape impos'd upon him, by telling him he muſt dip his tail in oil, ſurround it with hards of flax or hemp, and afterwards ſet fire to it; aſſuring him, that he, by this means, would loſe his ſtrength. Hanuman being thus equipp'd, ſet fire to Rawana's palace, and deſtroy'd part of Lanca. We have taken a particular notice of this incident, becauſe of its great reſemblance to the ſtory of Sampſon; and ſhall add, that Rawana's obſtinate refuſal to give up the woman he had carried off; the puniſhment which Ram and his brother Lekeman inflicted on him upon that account, and Ram's paſſage thro' the waters, have a great affinity with the hiſtory of Moſes. At laſt, Ram and Lekeman kill'd the raviſher Rawana with arrows, and the ape Hanuman fought as bravely for them at this juncture, as he had formerly done on other occaſions.

Baldæus takes no notice of the aſs's head, which is ſeen in the figure, over Rawana's ten heads.

Eighth INCARNATION.

The hiſtory of this incarnation, includes ſeveral particulars, which bear ſome relation to the life of Moſes, and that of our bleſſed Saviour. Viſtnou become man, under the form of a child, call'd in the Indian legend Kiſtna, is reſcued from the fury of a Raia, who was deſtin'd to die by that child's hand. Here follows an abſtract of that incarnation, which, according to the Indians, was the moſt divine and moſt excellent, that ever Viſtnou ſubmitted to.

A Raia, whoſe reſidence was at twenty-five Coſſes diſtance from Agra, after having married his ſiſter to a Bramin, reſolv'd to know what would befal her during her life, and for that purpoſe conſulted another Bramin, who was skill'd in the knowledge of futurity. The Bramin inform'd him, that this ſiſter of his, concerning whom he made ſuch earneſt enquiry, would be deliver'd of ſeven children, the laſt of which would bereave him of his crown: The king deeply afflicted at this fatal prediction, confin'd his ſiſter very cloſe, and cut all her children to pieces, as ſhe brought them into the world. At laſt, when ſhe was big of her ſeventh, the Raia heightned his vigilance, doubled the guards, and gave much ſtricter orders for putting the fatal child to death; but all his precautions were to no purpoſe, the princeſs was deliver'd of a male child, a miracle in beauty, who ſpoke the moment he came into the world, comforted his mother, and gave the moſt ſhining proofs of the Divinity which animated him. In a word, 'twas Viſtnou who thus aſſum'd the fleſh, under the name of Kiſna, for this is the name he bears in the legend; he caus'd himſelf to be exchang'd for another child, whom he afterwards reſcued from the fury of the Raia, by carrying it off; he eluded the vigilance of the guards, and fled away with his father and mother; he ſwam over a torrent, or croſs'd it as on dry land, and a ſerpent convoy'd over Viſſodheu, Viſtnou's father according to the fleſh, in this paſſage. The ſerpent carried his head aloft under young Viſtnou's body, and ſcreen'd him, like an umbrello, from the rain and the burning rays of the ſun. Kiſna by his power eſcap'd all the ſnares which the Raia laid for him, and was ever victorious over all the monſters who dar'd to aſſiſt his enemy's fury; he deſcended into the abyſs, and ſubdued the ſerpent Kalinag; he reveal'd himſelf in all the glory and majeſty of his Divinity, caus'd his omnipreſence omnipreſence to be acknowledg'd on all theſe occaſions, and [a] exempted the ſouls of the virtuous from tranſmigration. He one day met with a poor gardener's wife, who invited him to lodge with her, and diſcours'd with him after the ſame manner as the centurion did with our Saviour: but that which bears the greateſt reſemblance to an incident in our Saviour's life, is the action of an Indian woman, who pour'd a veſſel full of perfumes and eſſences on Kiſna's head. Another circumſtance in which he agrees with our Lord, is the meanneſs of his [b] extraction and condition; the Indian legend obſerves, that Kiſna was mightily ſought after by all devout females; they are ſure not to ſtay behind when any novelty is broach'd, and it may be affirm'd, that their readineſs in giving credit to any thing which appears with an air of wonder, makes their aſſiſtance very neceſſary, when any new ſect is to be eſtabliſh'd. On the other ſide, Kiſna was no enemy to the fair ſex; we ſee in the [c] figure repreſenting the eighth incarnation, how he transform'd himſelf into a ſtatue, and aſſum'd the form under which the Bramins have painted Viſtnou, in order to carry off the daughter of a Raia, whom he lov'd tenderly, and whoſe paſſion was reciprocal.

We ſhall conclude this explication of the eighth transformation of Viſtnou, by two circumſtances, which we think to be very remarkable; and theſe are, that he went up and down the whole earth, in order to puniſh the wicked, and was afterwards caught up into heaven.

Ninth INCARNATION.

Viſtnou went by the name of Boudhe, in order to reveal himſelf to men: this Boudhe, according to the doctrine of the Banians, had neither father nor mother; he is inviſible and all ſpirit; but whenever he reveals himſelf to his faithful ſervants, he aſſumes the figure under which Viſtnou is worſhipp'd by the Eaſt-Indians; they affirm that Boudhe, who is the mediator of mankind, prays to Mahadeu day and night for them.

Tenth INCARNATION.

The time for this incarnation is not yet come; Viſtnou will one day reveal himſelf, with Kallenki or Kelki, which is the name the Bramins give to a white-winged horſe, adorn'd with rich trappings, whom they ſuppoſe to be in the heavens: This horſe is led by a king, who has a liſted ſabre in his hand, and this monarch is undoubtedly Viſtnou. This horſe has always his right foot lifted up, but whenever he ſhall think fit to ſet it down on the earth, in order to puniſh the impious and the wicked, 'twill then ſink under the weight of it; the ſerpent Signag ſhall no longer be able to ſupport the earth; the tortoiſe oppreſs'd with the weight, ſhall plunge to the bottom of the ſea, and mankind in general ſhall be deſtroy'd, becauſe of their great degeneracy and corruption: Such will be the end of the laſt age of the world, after which the firſt age is to return again; for the Indians, and other idolaters of the Eaſt, ſuppoſe a revolution in the univerſe like to that of the Platoniſts.

Thus have we given the hiſtory of the ten incarnations, which include the myſteries of the theology of the Bramins, according to Baldæus, author of the Deſcription of Malabar and Coromandel. We believe, that theſe fictions are merely allegorical; as for inſtance, 'tis not very difficult to conceive what is repreſented by the whiteneſs and beauty of the horſe, which is the ſubject of the tenth incarnation; nor what is underſtood by his wings.

[a] The Indians aſſure, that the ſouls of good men, by a peculiar favour of Kiſna, go ſtrait to heaven, without wandring from body to body; they look upon the tranſmigration of ſouls as a puniſhment inflicted on mankind.

[b] The figure repreſents Kiſna as a ſhepherd, and according to the legend he kept ſheep.

[c] The figure deſcribes Kiſna, under the form of Viſtnou ſeated in a kind of pagod, with two Bramins on each ſide of him; but Kiſna, according to the Indian legend, when he transform'd himſelf into a ſtatue, went up into a chariot together with a Bramin, when he went upon his love-expedition.

wings. An Indian, who was but moderately skill'd in his religion, would aſſure us, that whiteneſs is an emblem of Viſtnou's purity, beauty that of his majeſty, and the wings of his ſwiftneſs; but a Bramin, who had been brought up in the midſt of types and figures, and who by deep reflection had got a happy knack of inventing at a pinch, would find twenty other myſteries in this incarnation.

Another circumſtance which we are to obſerve in this place, is, the ſurprizing contradictions we meet with in the relations of thoſe who have written on theſe myſterious incarnations; we ſcarce diſcover the leaſt conformity between the relations of the [a] reverend Mr. Roger, and that of Baldæus; that which a Portugueze writer has given us, is [b] very different from them both; and a fourth author, not only differs from all the three, but likewiſe changes the order of the incarnations, and gives them other names, as is manifeſt from the following explication.

Explications of the ten INCARNATIONS, extracted from Father Kircher's China illuſtrated.

We are oblig'd to Father P. Henry Roth, a Jeſuit, an Eaſt-Indian Miſſionary, for this explication; he aſſures, that the Bramins [c] acknowledge a kind of trinity, the three perſons whereof are Brahma, Bexhno, and Mahex.

" Theſe three perſons make but a ſingle one, in one nature, which they ſpecify under " different names; viz. Achar ſignifying immoveable; Paramanand, peaceable; " Paramexuar, ſovereign being; they likewiſe give him other names—Brahma is the " nature and eſſence of that ſovereign being, according to Brahma he is in all creatures. " Bexhno is the preſerver of all beings, and Mahex the deſtroyer—every thing conſiſts " in the general or univerſal, and the particular; the univerſal is the ſupreme being of " God, and the particular is nature itſelf, divided into its different parts—whence they " conclude, that there is no generical nor ſpecific diſtinction between created beings; " but that 'tis the ſame being, and the ſame nature of which all the individuals partake, " which aſſume different ſhapes and figures: as for inſtance, one portion or part of this " nature, or rather of this matter, aſſumes the ſhape of a man, another that of a ſtone, of " a tree, &c."

In this opinion two things may be diſtinguiſh'd; 1*ſt*, a ſupreme being who governs nature, and is the ſoul of it; 2*dly*, a dependant being, who is govern'd, i. e. nature modified and ſuſceptible of whatever impreſſions the ſupreme being ſhall pleaſe to give it.

" They ſay, that matter is no more than a meer illuſion of fancy; for which reaſon they " call the divine nature Ram, i. e. ſporting. They explain God's incarnation as follows; " he takes the greateſt particle, and cloaths himſelf with matter, which according to " them is compos'd of five elements; they aſſert, that 'tis by this great particle, (as by " an inſtrument) that he manifeſts his attributes more than by another common and " ordinary being which has a leſſer portion of this matter; 'tis on this in general that " their ſyſtems of the incarnations is grounded. Here follows the foundation of each of " them in particular; I. The firſt, which was rank'd as the ſixth in the foregoing " explications, is of Naraen, or the Prince of Men; (we find Ixatarboc in the figure, " which is not explain'd) Naraen was the eldeſt ſon of Jagexuar. The idolatrous " Indians feign, that this Naraen, whom the figure repreſents fighting with a many-arm'd " giant, kill'd a thouſand elephants with one cut of his ſword, which he holds in his " hand; he is always preſent to thoſe who invoke and call upon his name.

II. " Ramtzandar ſon of Bal is power and ſtrength. His brother Lexman was ſo " prodigiouſly ſtrong, that he kill'd a thouſand men with one ſhot of an arrow; but " Ramtzander was of a gentle and peaceable nature; and never employ'd the ſword, " becauſe

" becauſe he did every thing by his word. The ſole motive of his coming into the " world, was in order to free mankind from the tyrannical oppreſſion of the giants. He " was born at midnight, when heaven rain'd flowers on the place of his birth: the air, " in teſtimony of its joy and ſatisfaction, caus'd an harmonious concert of voices to be " heard." This incarnation muſt be expreſs'd under the name of Ramtzander, not that of Krexno. Lexman, of whom mention is here made, is in the ſeventh.

III. Maxautar, or Matſautar, the firſt in the preceding ones, is explain'd after a very different manner in this place; not to mention that the figure bears no manner of relation to the explication. " The Indians feign, that the Goddeſs Bhavani going one day to " the bath with her four ſhe-attendants, a giant call'd Bhenſaſer follow'd her in order " to catch her; but God aſſuming the ſhape of a fiſh, came out of the water and took " off the giant's head." The letter A denotes the metamorphoſis. B. Bhavani. C. Bhavani's, properly Bhenſaſer's head, which had been cut off. D. four Indian worſhippers.

IV. Barachautar, or Warahautar, is the third in the foregoing explications. " Before " this Being appear'd in the world, a certain giant reign'd over the whole earth, no one " daring to oppoſe his uſurpation. This giant had a ſtag's head, and his breath was ſo " peſtiferous, that nothing could poſſibly exiſt in his preſence; but God aſſuming the " ſhape of a wild boar, fought this monſter for twelve years, and at laſt deſtroy'd him. " A. points out Barachautar, C. (read B) the vanquiſh'd giant.

V. God aſſum'd the ſhape of Narſeng in the fifth incarnation, which was before computed the fourth. " The ſon of a certain captain repeating inceſſantly the name of Ram; " his father, who was Ram's enemy, would have chaſtiz'd him upon that account: but " God denoted by the letter A, chang'd himſelf into a pillar (the author means that the " pillar divided it ſelf) and aſſum'd the ſhape of a man, half lion or half tyger, who " open'd this captain's belly; to teach the world by this cataſtrophe, that we muſt never " reprove thoſe who praiſe and ſerve God."

VI. The incarnation call'd Dahaſar, which in this place is the ſixth, is the ſeventh in the foregoing explications. " Dahaſar had twenty arms and ten human heads, none of " which were animated. The idolaters ſay, that he keeps death chain'd down in his " houſe; that the wind ſerves and obeys him; that he is Lord of Zailaini, (Ceilan) " where he has built a fortreſs. In fine, they believe that Lexman, brother to Ramxan- " der, made a reſolution of taking away his life, for which purpoſe he took the famous " ape Hanuvan along with him, in order that if he himſelf ſhould fail of completing his " vengeance on Dahaſar, Hanuvan might diſpatch him with ſtones. In fine, the Bra- " mins aſſert, that Lexman kill'd the monſter with one ſhot of his arrow, which he " levell'd at an ape's head, repreſented over the ten heads of Dahaſar."

VII. The ſeventh incarnation is that of Jagarnat, which bears ſome relation to the ſecond in the foregoing. " Jagarnat denoted by the letter A, having undertaken to change the " ſituation of this world, and for that purpoſe taken that cumberſome maſs on his ſhoulders " with all its inhabitants, ſunk under the weight of it. By this accident he loſt both his " hands and his feet, which afterwards rotted away; and 'tis for this reaſon he is repre- " ſented without either hands or feet. They relate, that he convey'd his ſon which " ſprung from an egg (C) by the gallantry of Bex his mother (B) into the iſland of " Ceylan, by the help of the ſea (D) after which he aſſum'd the ſhape of the bird " Ibis (E), of a dog (F), and of a dragon (G)."

VIII. Krexno is here the eighth incarnation, and reſembles very much that of the ſame number in the foregoing. " He was ſeven times transform'd into a horſe (L), once into a " bull, and another time into an elephant. The greateſt title he ever had was that of Cow- " herd, and that becauſe he had ſixteen thouſand cows in his keeping. He has a wound in " his breaſt. His ſeven brethren were kill'd by a giant whoſe name was Kans. Jeſſodha " being with child of Krexno, the giant ſeiz'd upon her, and threw her into priſon,

and

" and had her guarded by four giants, (B. C. D. E.) and a ſerpent who ſurrounded the " place of her confinement. The giant Kan's deſign was to diſpatch Krexno, Jeſ- " ſodha's eighth child, in the ſame manner as he had kill'd the other ſeven; but happily " for the babe, the giants fell aſleep at the moment of his birth, by which means Jeſſodha " had an opportunity of ſaving her ſelf and the child by flight; the latter afterwards " put the giants to death."

IX. The ninth incarnation is that of Bhavani, " whom the Bramins call Kaſte or " power: they add, that the latter bears the name of Kaſtnennet, i, e. powerful or " mighty. Every thing they relate concerning this God and Goddeſs is myſterious; " they both ſignify matter and the principle of beings; and every thing they aſſert of " Puſſa (a Chineze Divinity) and of Harpocrates, may be aſcrib'd to Kaſtnennet, " who was chang'd into Lotum, and afterwards govern'd the world. The origin of " the fable of Lotum is grounded on the nature of that plant, which is always in water " and delights in moiſture; and the laſt, according to the Egyptians, is the principle " of all the productions of nature. The four arms of Bhavani repreſent the four " elements."

X. Har is the ſubject of the tenth and laſt incarnation, which is not yet accompliſh'd. " The Indians firmly believe, that he will deſtroy the law of Mahomet and extirpate " his followers: they add, that he will firſt manifeſt himſelf under the figure of a " peacock, and afterwards aſſume the ſhape of a winged horſe."

After having thus given two different explications of the incarnations of Wiſtnou, we now return to his worſhip, and the various manners under which he is repreſented. Wiſtnou, as we juſt now obſerv'd, is call'd Bexhno; and Permal, in the Diſſertation on the manners and religion of the Bramins. If Dapper, who has given us a deſcription of Aſia, may be credited, he is alſo repreſented under the figure of a column; but that agrees only with Ixora, as we ſhall ſhow hereafter, when we mention that Deity under the name of Mahadeu.

WISTNOU under the name of JAGARNAT.

Wiſtnou choſe this name in his ſeventh incarnation, according to Father Roth above cited. Here follows the particulars which Bernier has related on that ſubject in the 2d Vol. of his Voyages, pag. 103, & ſequent. Edition printed in 1709. He tells us, that in Jagarnat, a city ſituated in the gulph of Bengal, is a famous pagod ſacred to the divinity who bears that name. " A feſtival is there celebrated annually, which laſts eight " or nine days, at which upwards of an hundred and fifty thouſand pilgrims are ſome- " times aſſembled. A pompous wooden machine, adorn'd with extraordinary figures of " all kinds is rais'd, which is ſet on fourteen or ſixteen wheels, like a piece of cannon " on its carriage; and is puſh'd forward by fifty or threeſcore men. In the middle, Ja- " garnat, very richly adorn'd, is expos'd to publick view, and is carry'd from temple " to temple."

The firſt day that Jagarnat is thus expos'd to the devotion of the pilgrims, there is always ſuch a prodigious croud of them, that a conſiderable number of them never fail to loſe their lives; ſome being ſtifled, and others trod to death: but then 'tis very meritorious to die in this manner; and this kind of martyrdom is ever conſider'd as glorious by men, and crown'd with bleſſings from heaven. This is one of the articles of the Indian faith. Other devotees, whoſe zeal burns fiercer than that of the former, throw themſelves like ſo many mad people under Jagarnat's triumphal car, purpoſely that they may be cruſh'd to pieces under the wheels. But we muſt go to the ſource. The doctrine of [a] tranſmigration juſtifies in ſome meaſure the extravagance which appears at firſt ſight in this behaviour. The agreeable and deluſive idea which the Indians form to themſelves of a glorious tranſmigration, with which their earneſt deſire of obtaining a ſight of Jagarnat will be rewarded; juſtifies their ſuffering in that view, all that the Chriſtians themſelves would ſubmit to with the ſame intrepidity, were the metempſychoſis of the Bramins one of the principles of their religion.

[a] Notwithſtanding that, tranſmigration, according to the Indians, is a puniſhment inflicted on human nature; 'tis nevertheleſs pretended, that the merit of this martyrdom is ſo great, as to change the puniſhment into a kind of reward.

But to return to Jagarnat; Bernier takes notice of a remarkable circumſtance which is practis'd in the worſhip of that idol. The Bramins ſingle out a beautiful young Indian virgin, and carry her with great pomp and ceremony into the pagod of Jagarnat, in order that ſhe may there become the wife of the God. However, tho' the bride ſpends the night with the God, her ſuppos'd husband, 'tis generally believ'd, ſhe is not made his wife; but by virtue of an order given by Jagarnat to ſome Bramin to conſummate his marriage with her by proxy. The young maiden enquires, on this occaſion, of the pretended Jagarnat, whether the year will be fruitful; what proceſſions, feſtivals, prayers, and alms muſt be offer'd up in his honour, in order to obtain a fruitful year. However, Jagarnat is not ſo greatly enamour'd, but he has leiſure to attend to his intereſt: but, the polite behaviour, which a man, who has ever ſo little notion of gallantry, is oblig'd to aſſume, with regard to this bride in the honey-moon; makes us think that the propoſals which are made on theſe occaſions are favourable enough to be accepted with pleaſure by both parties. The next day after the marriage, the bride is carried in proceſſion from the nuptial pagod to another which ſtands near that of the God her husband.

IXORA under the name of MAHADEU.

MAHADEU ſignifies the ſovereign God [a]. He is repreſented under the ſhape of a pillar which diminiſhes inſenſibly from its baſe to its extremity at top. This extremity is very round. [b] The figure here repreſents the inſide of a pagod of Mahadeu, the form of the God, his worſhip, and the homage which devotees pay him. All the monſtrous figures with which the pagod is adorn'd, are ſo many Indian ſymbols or hieroglyphicks. They offer to Mahadeu milk, oil, rice, and ſuch like things.

The Bramins are very humble and devout at their entrance into the pagod of Ixora, and take off their ſhoes and ſtockings to do him the greater honour, before they ſet their feet on the threſhold. The ſame ceremony is obſerv'd with regard to Viſtnou. Whenever they are within a pagod, they are obliged always to have the pagod to their right and never to their left. The firſt ceremony is alſo obſerv'd in the Jewiſh religion. We have already taken notice, in the Diſſertation on the Manners and Religion of the Bramins, that every Indian Deity has an animal for its ſymbol, call'd by the Indians Vahanam; to which we ſhall add, that their Gods are frequently repreſented ſitting on tygers, or other animals, and even on mice. We are not to doubt, ſays Pietro della Valle, in the fourth volume of his voyages, but that the Indian ſages, who endeavour to keep the common people in the moſt profound ignorance, have veil'd the ſecrets of nature, the myſteries of religion, and even the moſt remarkable incidents in hiſtory under types and allegories; thus what appears vaſtly ridiculous to the eye, and is even repugnant to common ſenſe, is made in ſome meaſure plauſible, when unfolded or explain'd by a knowing and ſincere Bramin.

The pagods of Mahadeu, which Della Valle ſaw, were all adorn'd with various kinds of figures, in which he agrees with other travellers, and are generally painted red with white ſtreaks or lines intermix'd. Theſe two colours are in great eſteem among the Indians, who, according to the abovementioned author, may poſſibly have borrow'd that cuſtom

[a] 'Tis probable that this figure is the emblem of what was generally call'd Priapus; and that the modern Indian idolaters, as well as thoſe of antiquity, have equally conſidered it as the God of nature.
[b] That which is under the two laſt incarnations.

cuſtom from the Egyptians; which we believe to be true. The female Indians, and a certain order of religious idolaters, chuſe to have their cloaths red, rather than of any other colour. Certain Joguis put a lay of red mix'd with yellow on their bodies, which cuſtom is of great antiquity, ſince Strabo, on the teſtimony of Oneſicritus, relates that the Indian Gymnoſophiſts did ſo in Alexander's time.

The pagods of Mahadeu and of Wiſtnou are for ever crouded with beggars. Della Valle relates, that thoſe who were continually entring them to worſhip, had bells in their hands which they rung. Several Joguis naked, (or who may be almoſt ſaid to be ſo, ſince they have nothing but a large piece of linnen cloth wound round their bodies, which ſcarce covers the pudenda) aſſiſt continually in the pagod, at the religious homages which the people pay to Mahadeu. The foreheads of theſe Joguis are painted red and yellow, but their bodies have none of theſe ornaments. Della Valle is of opinion, that theſe Joguis are the diſciples and ſucceſſors of the ancient Gymnoſophiſts. The pagods are illuminated with lamps, &c. which burn inceſſantly before the images of Mahadeu and Wiſtnou. The ſame ceremony is obſerv'd with regard to the other Deities.

I X O R A under the name of L I N G A M.

Ixora bears alſo the name of [a] Lingam. From the idea under which it is repreſented in the figure, we may beſt compare it to the [b] Priapus of the ancients. The Joguis wear the Lingam about their necks; but it would be impoſſible for fancy to invent any thing more obſcene, than the poſture in which they repreſent this double figure, to whom they aſſiduouſly offer the firſt-fruits of their meals. We aſcribe to the notion the Indians entertain, that every thing is form'd by generation, the blind devotion they pay to this Lingam, in which they confound the agent with the means he employs. It will be impoſſible to juſtify them in any manner on this head, but by conſidering it as a type or ſymbol, which ſtill cannot but be very ſhocking to decency and good-manners: but we cannot help thinking that thoſe who firſt invented theſe myſterious figures, were naturally inclin'd to ſatiate by luſt, what they exhibited for the emblem of a Deity.

It cannot be denied, but that the worſhip which is paid to nature, may have migrated from the Eaſt into the Weſt, together with the ſymbolical figures under which they repreſented it; we are therefore not to wonder, that the ſame idea ſhould have diſcover'd itſelf under different names, to people who live at a great diſtance one from the other; ſince as they both receiv'd the object of their worſhip from the ſame ſource, they were under a neceſſity of receiving the ſame images with the ſame ceremonies: To do theſe people juſtice, nothing can better expreſs the fruitfulneſs of nature, than the union of both ſexes, and the vigour of Priapus, whoſe [c] name is very expreſſive; however, 'tis ſurprizing, that men, who, if we except ſome of the moſt brutal ſavages, have always paid ſome regard to decency, ſhould be ſo infamouſly loſt to all ſenſe of it, as to carry in [d] proceſſion with great pomp and ſolemnity, thoſe parts of the body, which ought never to be reveal'd, but in caſes of the higheſt neceſſity; and [e] expoſe them publickly in the roads, in houſes and temples, as is the cuſtom in the Eaſt-Indies.

Pietro della Valle, whom we quote with pleaſure, becauſe of his great exactneſs, and the curious reſearches, which we meet with in his voyages, obſerves, (in the 4th vol. p. 69, and 209, of the Bologna Edition, printed in 1672.) that the Gods of the Indians are are always represented naked, and that several figures in very indecent postures are seen in the pagods; undoubtedly he saw the Lingam abovemention'd there. The other figures might possibly represent the vows or homages of the devout Indians, among whom the women don't scruple to prostitute themselves in honour of the Gods. Husbands behold with the most profound humility these meritorious prostitutions, which so often revive what we in Europe look upon as the greatest injury and affront; so true it is, that false principles in religion easily destroy those of common decency, and even frequently change the very ideas which nature has implanted in us. As a husband is fully persuaded he has been cuckolded by a God, he is therefore very well satisfied. The [a] Joguis is the idol's curate, and performs the ceremony in quality of his proxy, while the devoutly-patient husband, in the mean time, washes the saints feet, and pays him the utmost veneration. The people of the house withdraw, and leave the lady to the saint's embraces. When this institution was made, the crafty Indians undoubtedly insinuated some hopes of future felicity at the same time. When we have once found out the secret of gaining an ascendant over peoples minds, can it be a difficult matter to assure the female devotees, that,

Si quelque chose les empeche
D'aller tout droit en paradis,
C'est d'epargner pour leurs maris,
Un bien dont ils n'ont plus que faire,
Quand ils ont pris leur necessaire.

La Fontaine dans ses Contes.

The sense of which is,

If any thing prevents their being immediately wafted to Paradise, 'tis to reserve for their husbands, a pleasure which they have no farther occasion for, when they have had their quantum of it.

We shall conclude with an instance which manifestly shews, that the Indians look upon the obscene devotions mention'd in this article, as highly meritorious. "Over the "gate of one of the cities of the little kingdom of Sirinpatan, says Dellon in the pre- "face to his voyages printed in 1709, stands a stone statue representing Sita, wife to "Ram, one of their Gods, about as big as the life. On each side of her are three "famous Faquirs, or penitents, naked, on their knees, their eyes lifted up towards her, "and holding with both hands what decency will not permit me to mention. They "pretend by this posture——to pay such a homage, as they judge to be most grateful "to this pretended Goddess."

The INDIAN PROCESSIONS.

The figure represents the procession of Wistnou, which we have already describ'd in the Dissertation on the manners and religion of the Bramins, and therefore shall say no more on that head. Pietro della Valle, in the 4th vol. of his voyages, pag. 211. has given us a description of a procession of Eswara, under the name of Virrena-deuru, which [a] Fryar's Voyages to the East-Indies. There are few readers but have heard in what manner the Babyloniss women us'd to prostitute themselves in honour of Mylitta, the Venus of the Chaldeans; but according to Herodotus, they never prostituted themselves but once in their lives, and then to foreigners only. These females, whose heads were crown'd with flowers, used to go and seat themselves in the temple of Mylitta; the foreigner was allow'd to make choice of the She among them whom he liked best, which done, he threw money to her, and the woman thus pitch'd upon, was not permitted to refuse it, tho' the sum were never so trifling, because it belong'd to the Goddess. The Belles soon did their business, but as for the Ugly, they had the ill luck to linger a long time, before they could pay their homage to Venus. Religious prostitutions were also practis'd in the island of Cyprus. Tavernier mentions a pagod of Cambaia, whither the Indian curtesans go in pilgrimage. Such as are grown old in the profession, purchase young she-slaves with the money they have got, and bring them up in the trade; and when their young pupils are of age, their mistresses carry them to the pagod, and there abandon them to the idol.

which according to him ſignifies the lord Virrena. He has heightned this deſcription with a curious detail of the ceremonies which he ſaw obſerv'd in this religious act, the ſubſtance of which is as follows. [a] In the green on which the pagod ſtands, whence Virrena-deuru was taken to be carried in proceſſion, were three other little ones, in one whereof Baſwa or Baſvana, who is Eſwara's ſon, and Vahanam, was repreſented under the figure of an ox. A like image was ſeen in the inmoſt receſs of the pagod of Virrena, oppoſite to the ſtatue of the latter; the ſignal of the ceremony was given by a bell, which was rung by the prieſts who were in the ſanctuary, for I believe we may give this name to this innermoſt apartment; thoſe without anſwer'd the ſignal with drums and flutes. In the mean time, they ſet lights on the two rows of palliſades, which were erected for that purpoſe, from the gate of the firſt porch to the entrance of the ſanctuary: They alſo lighted up torches in the other parts of the pagod; a cuſhion was got ready, on which they ſet the idol of Virrena in a little cover'd ſedan, like thoſe which are kept ready for the ceremony of thoſe proceſſions. We are to obſerve, that there were two images of Virrena in the pagod; one whereof was of wood, which was not taken out of its niche; this niche was not made in the retired part of it, and conſequently the Indians had the wooden ſtatue in much leſs veneration than the other, which was never brought out of the ſanctuary, but when the moſt ſhining acts of devotion were to be perform'd: They were each two palms in height, ornaments and all, and were painted, gilt, and adorn'd with white flowers. As ſoon as the march began, a miniſter, whom perhaps we may properly call the maſter of the ceremonies, appear'd at the head of the proceſſion, holding a little bell in his hand, which he rang continually, he was follow'd by ſeveral perſons; after which came two torch-bearers, who walk'd immediately before the Virrena's ſedan; another miniſter of the pagod walk'd next, carrying incenſe. Such was the order of the proceſſion, which was firſt made in the green round about the temple, whence theſe devotees ſet out by a gate oppoſite to that by which they enter'd. After this, the proceſſion went out of the green into the ſtreet, little bells ringing, flutes playing, and drums beating during the whole march. Poſſibly, ſays our author, they went and made a [b] ſtation at ſome other pagod of the place; be that as it will, they return'd back in the ſame order, and were follow'd by a conſiderable number of devotees of both ſexes, into the green on which the pagod ſtood, whence they firſt ſet out, and round which the proceſſion march'd three times.

The remaining part of the ceremony has certain very particular inſtances in it: The proceſſion, after having gone thrice round, as was before obſerv'd, ſtopt at the firſt porch of the pagod, juſt oppoſite to the ſanctuary. The idol which lay in the ſedan, was rais'd by one of its miniſters, and kept in an upright poſture for a conſiderable time, in order for its receiving the homage of another prieſt, who ſtood oppoſite to it in the ſanctuary, tho' at a pretty great diſtance from it. The manner in which this prieſt paid his homage, was by making ſeveral circles with a torch, downwards and upwards, and upwards and downwards, in honour of Virrena; and theſe religious circles always terminated downwards. This being done, he drew a right line with his torch from the ſide oppoſite to the circle, to that where the circle began. However, the circles don't always begin on the ſame ſide, but go ſometimes to the right, and at other times to the left.

This is what the prieſt obſerv'd in the ſanctuary of his idol; after which, he came out of it, and going through the rail, or rather paliſades, on which a certain number of torches were placed, he preſented himſelf before the idol in the firſt porch of the pagod. We may naturally ſuppoſe, that he only, as chief miniſter of Virrena, was allow'd to go this

[a] The reader muſt here call to mind, the deſcription we gave of the pagods in the Diſſertation on the manners and religion of the Bramins.

[b] Station is an eccleſiaſtical term, and ſignifies to viſit with devotion one or more churches a certain number of days and times, and to ſpend ſome time in prayer there, in order to appeaſe God's wrath, and to obtain ſome bleſſing from his unbounded mercy.

this way, ſince the other devotees, not even the prieſts themſelves, paſs'd always by the rail. He came up to it ringing his little bell, drums beating, and flutes playing at the ſame time, and was follow'd by a young clerk, who carried a baſon fill'd with conſecrated water, in which ſome ſandal wood was put, of that kind undoubtedly with which ſome religious orders among the Indians paint their foreheads: The prieſt turn'd thrice about the idol with the baſon, obſerving to begin always towards the left, which was the right with regard to the ſedan on which the object of this ceremony was ſeated. The three turns ended exactly in the place where they began; after which, the miniſter ſet down his bell, and ſtopping by the ſide of the ſedan with the baſon in his hand, dipt his finger in the ſacred water, in order to mark the Idol on the forehead, or on ſome other part with it; for Della Valle does not tell us which. The prieſt pour'd ſome of this water into his hand, and rubb'd his forehead with it, and did the ſame to him who carried the ſtatue of Virrena, and threw the water which was left without the pagod, at ſome diſtance, and oppoſite to the ſedan; and taking a wax taper in his hand, drew in the ſedan, and even in the preſence of the idol, a great number of circles like to thoſe he had before made; which being done, he drew certain lines. Having done this, he put out the candle, and concluded this act of devotion by taking the idol Virrena in his arms, which he carried aloft till he was got to the ſanctuary, when he again ſet it in its niche. Then another miniſter began to diſtribute among the faithful who were aſſembled, chich peas mix'd with little pieces of Indian nut, all which was undoubtedly bleſs'd and conſecrated in due form. We may preſume, that theſe were the fragments of the offerings which had been made to the idol; but be that as it will, the devotees eat what the prieſt gave them with great reſpect and devotion. We are to obſerve, that the men, that is, the ſecular part of the aſſembly, were not admitted any farther than the firſt court, whereas the women were plac'd near the rail, viz. between the firſt porch and the ſanctuary, and to the right and left of the lights.

The proceſſions of the Indians always open with the ſound of inſtruments; the muſic are generally at the head of the proceſſion, ſeveral of whom are trumpets, who are follow'd by a great many female dancers, two and two, and all of them unveil'd. The virtue of theſe dancers conſiſts, in their proſtituting themſelves out of love for the Gods: We ſhall mention them once more in the ſequel; after the dancers, come the ſedan of the idols, which are follow'd by a great number of perſons carrying Indian pikes and lances, adorn'd with ſilk ſtreamers, and ſeveral umbrellos ſet off in the ſame manner: Other ſhe-dancers walk at equal diſtances on both ſides the ſedan; but as theſe are not oblig'd to dance, they have a piece of ſtuff like kerchiefs on their heads, which hangs on their ſhoulders, and falls down as low as their ſtomachs. Such ſhe-dancers as are neareſt the ſedan, have a ſmall ſilver ſtaff in their hands, the end of which is ſet off with hair; theſe ſtaves are to drive off the flies from the idol. The prieſts of the pagod and the Indian fryars afterwards advance forwards with torches in their hands.

KAMAETZMA.

The figure repreſents the pagod of Kamaetzma adorn'd with ſeveral groteſque figures, after the manner of other pagods. Kamaetzma, according to the tradition of the Bramins, is wife to Ixora or Eſwara, but we cannot ſay whether ſhe be the ſame with Parvati. There is a remarkable ceremony obſerv'd in honour of this Goddeſs, the artful manner whereof diſcovers both the credulity of the people, and the aſſiduouſneſs of the prieſts to make their advantage of it. They carry annually to her pagod, on the day of her feſtival, a great quantity of fruits of various ſorts, and dreſs up a young child with flowers, whom they afterwards ſet on the ſide of a deep grotto, which has a communication with a great ſubterraneous paſſage. Night is no ſooner come, than they ſhut the pagod very carefully, in which the child is left alone; but one of Kamaetzma's miniſters comes in the night, takes away the fruits, and afterwards carries both them and the child to the bottom of the grotto, whence he returns the next day with the child crown'd with flowers. We may preſume, that theſe fruits are the firſt-fruits offer'd to a Deity, who enjoys the ſame imaginary quality among the Indians, that Pomona had formerly among the Romans.

PILGRIMAGES of the INDIANS.

The Indians go in [a] pilgrimage to the temples of their idols, and theſe, when they fancy they have obtain'd any particular bleſſing from them, never fail to raiſe monuments in their honour, as a teſtimony of their gratitude and acknowledgment, wherein are repreſented the cure which they have wrought, or the danger they have eſcap'd. To give ſome inſtances of theſe cuſtoms, Pietro della Valle relates, that near mount Gate is a pagod ſacred to Hanuman or Hanuvan, the Ape-God before mention'd. In this pagod the ſtatue of the Ape-God is ſeen in the midſt of a great number of lighted lamps [b]; the famous traveller above mention'd ſaw a ſilver hand hung up there near the idol, which undoubtedly had been given by ſome devotee, whom Hanuman had perhaps cur'd of ſome ailment in that part. The ſame traveller relates, that he himſelf was an eye-witneſs to the preparations which were made in this pagod, for a ſolemn pilgrimage that was to be undertaken, which he compares to thoſe of Loretto and Rome in the jubilee year. Hanuman made one of the company, and was carried in a ſedan, inſtruments accompanied with voices playing as he went along.

The fourth figure in the plate A, repreſents the dreſs of a Bramin She-pilgrim; we muſt not omit, that theſe devotees at their return from theſe pilgrimages, are uſually ſet off with ſuch leaves and flowers, as the prieſts adorn the faces of the idols with. When theſe begin to wither, they are diſtributed among the pilgrims, who receive them with the higheſt teſtimonies of devotion, kiſſing them, and wearing them on their heads, as a manifeſt token of the veneration and reſpect they have for them. The Indians tell us, that theſe leaves and flowers are endued with certain extraordinary virtues, which they undoubtedly receive from the holineſs of the idol; but 'tis certain, they bring in very conſiderable profits to the prieſts. We are of opinion, that theſe people have the ſame idea of pilgrimages as other nations; 'twould be needleſs to ſpin out our reflections to a greater length.

PENANCES, AUSTERITIES, and other CUSTOMS of the like Nature practis'd by the INDIANS.

We have already mention'd ſome of theſe cuſtoms in the 13th Chap. of the Diſſertation on the manners and religion of the Bramins; but there are others much more ſurprizing than the abovemention'd, eſpecially among the Joguis, who affect to devote themſelves to the moſt dreadful torments, from a principle of pride and fanaticiſm. 'Twould be no difficult matter to find theſe two principles in the hearts of ſuch as affect to be more holy than their neighbours; and that becauſe theſe perſons voluntarily ſubmit to certain puniſhments which no one inflicts upon them; and which, the author of nature himſelf could not require at their hands, without being unjuſt in ſome meaſure. The heart of man is very oddly fram'd; was a prince ſo cruel, as to command ſome of his ſubjects to lie all their lives among aſhes, or to ſtand upright, and not lean once, for the ſake of procuring ſome eaſe, till they died; ſuch a monarch would infallibly be look'd upon as a tyrant, and yet we meet with ſome men who inflict ſuch puniſhments upon themſelves. But to purſue our reflections, there cannot one religion be nam'd, ſome of whoſe profeſſors don't voluntarily accuſtom themſelves to the moſt dreadful torments and auſterities, auſterities; tho' at the ſame time they dare not pretend to ſay, that heaven commands them to torture themſelves in that manner. Perhaps ſome devotees might object, that Chriſtianity enjoins her profeſſors to exerciſe theſe ſeverities on themſelves; but we cannot bring ourſelves to think, that ever any perſon went ſuch lengths, as to pull out an eye, or cut off an arm, to eſcape the temptations to which they might otherwiſe be liable: and in caſe there have been any ſo ſilly as to emaſculate themſelves, in order to check certain irregular impulſes, which very often the moſt pious chriſtian, is no more able to ſuppreſs than aninfidel; ſuch deluded wretches have been charitably told, that the Goſpel did not require they ſhould caſtrate themſelves, and that impotency does not make a man a better Chriſtian.

But to return to the Joguis, whoſe name, according to Bernier, ſignifies united to God; they are a kind of hermits, who are the more vile, becauſe they fancy themſelves to be diſtinguiſh'd from all mankind by their exceſſive ſufferings: Theſe are generally ſeen ſtanding under trees, or near their pagods; ſome of them go ſtark naked, whoſe tangled hair, divided as it were into branches, deſcends lower than their knees; they hold their arms a-croſs over their heads, and ſtand all their life-time in this poſture: Other penitents ſleep on the ground, with one leg higher than the other, and their two arms rais'd above their heads, without once removing them. Theſe two attitudes are repreſented in the third compartment of the figure A. Theſe wretched penitents loſe inſenſibly the uſe of their arms and legs; but then ſome young novices of their order attend upon them with ſuch an awe and reſpect, as is worthy a better cauſe. There are even ſome perſons of both ſexes, who make a vow of devoting themſelves to their ſervice, and theſe are wholly employ'd in ſoothing the voluntary ſufferings of the Joguis with alms and refreſhments, and to cleanſe them of their filth. The four compartments of the plate B, repreſent ſeveral other whimſical poſtures of theſe penitents; thoſe of the ſecond compartment flaſh their bodies in ſeveral places; thoſe of the third, fancy they do a very meritorious action in feeding a peacock for Bruma's ſake, to whom that bird is ſacred; thoſe of the fourth, who are ever expos'd to the burning rays of the ſun, obſerve the ſame piety with regard to other birds, and carry their charity ſo far, as to let them perch upon their heads. When theſe hold their ſpiritual converſations, they ſit cloſe together in a ring, and tie at the end of a ſtick, a banner or ſtandard made of ſeveral pieces of ſtuff or linnen cloth of different colours.

The firſt and ſecond compartment of the Plate A, repreſenting the uneaſy poſture of two female penitents, the firſt whereof attends to the prayers of a ſhe-devotee, who recommends herſelf to her; and the other fancies her Gods will look upon her continuing always in the ſame poſture as a very meritorious action; oblige us to do juſtice to the piety of their ſex, which is often more fervent than that of men: the reaſon of this, is, becauſe their thoughts are leſs diſtracted; not to mention, that women have a more obſtinate bent, or are more inclin'd to give into extraordinary practices. But all this is no more than the natural reſult of the complexion of their minds, which are eaſily captivated by a gaudy outſide.

Some Joguis confine themſelves in cages which are ſet on the top of a thick ſtake fix'd in the ground; theſe cages are ſo little, that the penitent is prodigiouſly tortur'd in them. Under theſe priſons, and on a piece of wood which goes croſs the ſtake, two little idols of Ixora or Mahadeu are plac'd, the perpetual object of the worſhip of all recluſe. Some holding a ſabre in one hand, and a kind of ſhield in the other, go up a crane with great boldneſs, when hooking themſelves to an iron, which runs a conſiderable way into their backs, they ſpring forward into the air, with ſuch a boldneſs and intrepidity, as might juſtly excite our admiration, was not an inſupportable pride the only motive of it. In theſe mad gambols, their only care is to make a vain oſtentation of their ſufferings; when flouriſhing their ſabres, and launch out into the moſt extravagant extravagant praiſes of their idols, they endeavour to draw the eyes of the ſpectators upon them, by performing ſeveral feats of agility, to the great ſcandal of the religion they endeavour to inſtil into the minds of their diſciples. Some of theſe Joguis plunge into the Ganges, in hopes of being devour'd by crocodiles, and theſe ſilly wretches fancy they ſhall thereby obtain the felicities of the next life. In fine, others kill themſelves in preſence of their Gods.

Baldæus relates, that Canara in the kingdom of Cananor is very famous for its Joguis, whoſe lives are conſider'd by the Indians as ſo many perfect models of piety and holineſs; theſe ſaints generally live in pagods, but they often walk ſtark naked with little bells in their hands, in order to call the pious of both ſexes to their devotions. If this author is to be credited, their women of the greateſt diſtinction handle the privities of theſe ſaints for God's ſake; perhaps our prudes, who affect a ſpecious inſenſibility, might in time be brought to acquieſce with this kind of devotion, were this cuſtom to be once introduc'd among us.

Such are the Joguis, whom travellers repreſent as a ſet of dangerous hypocrites, that often conceal the moſt flagrant vices; * but notwithſtanding this, the Indian devotees go daily and ſalute them, kiſs their hands, and ſtand in the moſt humble poſtures, while they liſten to the ſentences which are utter'd by theſe ſhameleſs religious. Della Valle tells us, that they live in community, under the direction of a ſuperior, in the ſame manner as our monks; but they are continually wandring about, even in cities, where they always live in the ſtreets, or the places of publick reſort, in which, as was before obſerv'd, they ſtand naked, without once moving, or diſcovering the leaſt motion. We are likewiſe aſſur'd, that there never was a ſhe Indian, whether wife or widow, but beheld this nakedneſs with a ſtoical indifference; but 'tis certain they could not be parallel'd in Europe, where 'tis not the faſhion to go naked.

Della Valle tells us moreover, that they hold ſpiritual conferences among themſelves, and have certain exerciſes relating to the ſciences; but he concludes from one of their books call'd Damerd bigiaska, that magic is their only ſtudy. He adds, that they pretend to have revelations, by the virtue of their ſpiritual exerciſes, prayers, and faſts; and that a ſecret and carnal commerce, which they hold with the demons or Genii, enables them to pry into futurity. They aſſure, that theſe intelligences appear to them in the ſhape of women; and that if they can but be ſo happy, as to bind themſelves to them by the ties of a ſpiritual marriage, (which poſſibly may be the effect of an imagination enflam'd by the lives they lead) they then may flatter themſelves ſo far as to think they are entirely ſpiritualiz'd, and that their nature is ſomething more than human.

After having ſpoken thus far of the Joguis, we may juſtly add ſome other particulars concerning the enlightned among the Indians. " Some of theſe, ſays Bernier, quit the " world entirely, and generally withdraw, like ſo many hermits, to ſome unfrequented " garden, far remov'd from all inhabited places, and never after once ſet their foot in " cities. In caſe any thing is carried them to eat, they take it; otherwiſe they do without " it, and 'tis believ'd that the grace of God enables them to ſubſiſt in their perpetual " faſts and auſterities, and above all, wrapt up in meditation——Nay, 'tis ſometimes " ſo deep, that they continue whole hours together in extaſy; during which, the " outward ſenſes ſuſpend all their uſual functions, (which would be wonderful and " ſurprizing, were it true) that they ſee God himſelf under the form of a certain very " white, ſtrong, and ineffable light, with as inexpreſſible joy as that of our ſaints, who " have had a ſtrict intimacy with Chriſt and the Bleſſed Virgin. He adds, that theſe " enlightned preſcribe rules to themſelves, in order to bind down the ſenſes by " inſenſible degrees; they ſaying, for inſtance, that after having liv'd for ſeveral days " upon bread and water, they muſt then withdraw alone to ſome ſolitude, where they " muſt keep their eyes fix'd on high for ſome time, without once ſtirring; then bring " them

" them gently downwards, and fix them equally on the tips of their noſes, juſt as much " on oneſide as on the other . . . . . and continue with their eyes thus fix'd, till ſuch time as " the above mention'd light comes." Bernier farther aſſures us, that ſome of theſe Joguis ſtudy chymiſtry and the occult ſciences; but the moſt dangerous of all, are thoſe whoſe devotion being leſs unpolite and ruſtic, indulge themſelves ſo far as to converſe freely with the world. Theſe go bare-footed, bare-headed, and bind a kind of ſcarf about them, which reaches down to their knees, but then they are not ſo filthy and ſlovenly as the other Joguis: They enter with great familiarity into the houſes of the heathens, who think they bring the bleſſings of the Gods along with them; this is what Bernier relates, in a letter of his concerning the heathens of Indoſtan.

The Indians have another order of [a] Bramins, who not only live in the ſtricteſt celibacy, but are ſo ſcrupulouſly chaſte, as never once to look upon a woman. They have people to walk before them, purpoſely to give notice to all the women they meet, to get out of their ſight.

Par de pareils objets les ames ſont bleſſées,

Moliere's Tartuffe.

The ſenſe in Engliſh.

Such objects as theſe taint the mind, and awake guilty ideas.

Such inſtances would almoſt perſuade us, that the Creator never intended devotees ſhould propagate their ſpecies; however, there are very ſtrong proofs to the contrary. Nevertheleſs, the Bramins with all their boaſted modeſty, could not pretend to compare themſelves with the prieſts of Cybele, ſince the latter us'd to ſuppreſs all temptations which the fair ſex might excite in them, by a voluntary caſtration.

Della Valle has deſcrib'd the manner of their ordaining a doctor, prieſt, or religious, which merits to be taken notice of in this place. The candidate, cloath'd in white, with two large umbrello's on each ſide of him, was carried in a ſedan into the midſt of the green, on which the pagod ſtood, follow'd by a led horſe, and accompanied with a great concourſe of his brethren, who attended purpoſely to honour the inſtalment; the ſedan and the doctors were preceded by ſeveral ſoldiers and players upon inſtruments: during the march, the ſhe-dancers, who ſang at the ſame time, and ſeem'd to be led up by another perſon that danc'd ſingly, and with her face always turn'd towards the ſedan, danc'd a Ballet, or figure-dance, after the Indian manner; the ceremony of the ordination was perform'd by pouring water on the candidate's head. The dances being ended, the ſedan was carried out of the city. The proceſſion made ſeveral ſtations, as they went along, the dances ſtill continuing; but they always danc'd the laſt figure-dance, when the doctor was got to his houſe.

We are told, that theſe doctors, who are both prieſts and religious, always affect a grave, ſevere, and wandring air; the manner of ſaluting them, is to throw one's ſelf proſtrate at their feet, and afterwards to kiſs them. Such as aſpire at being Gægis, are novices for ſix months; one of the chief circumſtances of their probation, is to mix about a pound of cow-dung with their victuals.

The figure, N° C. repreſents the manner of accompliſhing all ſuch vows as are made to Ganga Gramma in a fit of ſickneſs, or any other imminent danger. The worſhip and ceremony which are obſerv'd with regard to this Deity, are juſtly deſcrib'd in Chap. XI. Part II. of the Diſſertation on the manners and religion of the Bramins; to which we ſhall add three obſervations. I. That the idol which is carried up and down in a chariot, is is made like that of Jagarnat; whence it may be preſum'd, that Ganga and Jagarnat are one and the ſame Deity. II. That certain devotees are ſo unaccountably infatuated, as to lay themſelves under Ganga's chariot, and are there cruſh'd to pieces, which is alſo done to Jagarnat, as was before obſerv'd. III. That they ſacrifice he-goats in honour of Ganga, with a view of obtaining a remiſſion of their ſins, in which particular, the Jews and Indians are in ſome meaſure agreed.

There are among the Indians certain penitent women, who are conſulted in the ſame manner, as antiently the Pythian maid, and the Sybils, &c. Theſe devote themſelves entirely to the ſervice of the Gods, who ſometimes honour them ſo far as to lie with them. People croud from all parts, in order to conſult them about futurity, and their anſwers are look'd upon as ſo many deciſions, which as chance ſometimes verifies, prepoſſeſſion rarely ſuffers to be conſider'd as falſe. We ſhall conclude this article with the following remark, viz. that the enthuſiaſts of all religions, and ſuch as aſcribe to themſelves the gift of inſpiration, delight in confounding the images of carnal love with that of God. The ideas of marriage, nuptials, marriage-bed, generation, embraces, &c. are always preſent to their imaginations. They grow warm with theſe reflections, nor are even the legends of our ſaints exempt from them, and to theſe we refer the reader.

The ADORATION of the INDIANS, and their RELIGIOUS DANCES.

The manner of the Indians adoring their Gods, is by claſping their hands before them, and by bringing them thus claſp'd as low as poſſible, to denote their profound humility: They muſt afterwards be rais'd by inſenſible degrees in a very modeſt manner, be brought near their mouths, be very religiouſly kiſs'd, and thus claſp'd be laid on their heads; which, according to the Eaſterns both antient and modern, is the greateſt teſtimony of reſpect that can poſſibly be ſhewn to any object. Common prayers are always ſaid ſtanding; but when the circumſtances of the devotee ſeem to require a more profound humiliation, he muſt fall proſtrate with his face againſt the ground, touch it with his forehead, and kiſs the duſt. This homage being perform'd, the devotee then commonly turns himſelf round ſome ſacred tree, great numbers of which are ſet near their pagods. The ceremony concludes with an offering of rice, oil, or milk; and laſtly, the devotee goes away, having firſt beſtow'd an alms upon the miniſters of his Gods.

The religious worſhip of the Indians, with regard to their idols, conſiſts in incenſing them, and waſhing them every day, and preſenting them with eatables.

We have already taken notice of the religious dances perform'd in honour of the Gods, by a company of women who unite together religion and proſtitution. Theſe dances ſuit exactly the way which thoſe women have made choice of; they being accompanied with all ſuch poſtures as are moſt ſhocking to decency and good manners. The prieſts themſelves dance before the idols with only a pair of drawers on, they have a ſword in their hands, with which they perform ſeveral nimble feats; the manner of their worſhipping the idols, is conformable to the ideas they have form'd to themſelves of their Gods, or to ſuch as they deſire to inſtil into the minds of the people.

The VENERATION the INDIANS pay to SERPENTS; of their INCHANTMENTS and ORACLES.

Theſe ſubjects have been already treated in the XXVI. and XXVII. ſections of the Conformity between the ceremonies and cuſtoms of the Indians, &c. to which we ſhall now add the following obſervations.

The Indians, according to Baldæus, believe that ſerpents are divine Genii, and that the meeting them in one's way is propitious; they frequently call their children and cows after the name of a ſerpent. The various repreſentations of theſe creatures, make one of the fineſt embelliſhments of their pagods, and they even direct their vows and prayers to them.

them. A [a] traveller aſſures, " that whenever the Indians meet with adders in their " houſes, they firſt intreat them to go away; in the moſt reſpectful manner; but in caſe " prayers are ineffectual, they endeavour to prevail with them to abſcond, by offering " them milk or ſomething elſe, but never drive them out by force. If the adder is " obſtinate and will not go away, they then aſſemble the Bramins, who with all the " eloquence they are maſters of, lay before the animal the ſeveral motives which ſhould " induce it to have ſome conſideration for the houſe into which it is entred, &c.

" Some of theſe idolaters, from a whimſical ſpirit of piety, carry milk and other kinds " of food into the foreſts and roads for the ſubſiſtance of theſe groveling and " contemptible Deities; but the reaſon of their ſo doing may poſſibly be, that as theſe " adders by this means meet with food ſufficient to live upon in the fields, it may " hereby prevent their coming to look for any in their houſes."

We are aſſur'd, that the Indian prieſts employ a charm, which has the power of taking away all their venom. Pyrard de Laval relates in his voyages, that certain people in India ramble up and down the country, purpoſely to practiſe an art, which perhaps is no more than a quack artifice, and a great skill in ſome particular drugs. The reverend Mr. Baldæus corroborates this circumſtance, by the example of a German ſoldier, who, by the help of certain antidotes, handled theſe venomous reptiles, without the leaſt fear, and even laid them by him when he was in bed. This credulous Dutch clergyman owns, that he firſt ſuſpected this German for a wizard, but he afterwards adds, that the Indians of Coromandel and Malabar can charm ſerpents, and make them dance by the power of their ſong. May we not ſuppoſe, that their ſinging in this manner is a meer impoſition upon the people, purpoſely to make them believe they don't employ any kind of antidote? Beſides, how did Baldæus know, but that theſe adders might have been taught, and brought up to hand a conſiderable time?

The Indians have their oracles; but Father Bouchet aſſures us in a letter of his written to Father [b] Baltus upon that ſubject, that they ceaſe in proportion as the chriſtian religion ſpreads itſelf in India. " The devils, ſays he, pronounce theſe oracles by the " mouth of the prieſts of the idols, or ſometimes of ſuch perſons as are preſent when the " devil is invok'd——A fact, of the truth whereof no one in India has the leaſt doubt, " and whoſe evidence is ſuch, as to ſilence any thing of that nature, is, that the devils " pronounce oracles, and that thoſe evil ſpirits ſeize on the very prieſts who invoke them, " nay, ſometimes on the ſpectators. The prieſts of the idols have a ſet of abominable " prayers, with which they addreſs the devils when they are conſulted on any affair. " The evil ſpirit throws the perſon whom he makes choice of for his organ, into a violent " agitation; not a limb of him but trembles, and his head moves up and down in a moſt " frightful manner. He ſometimes forces tears from his eyes——and ſwells him with that " kind of fury and enthuſiaſm, which was formerly found among the heathens; and which " the Indians to this day look upon as a ſign of the devil's being preſent, and a prelude " to his anſwers.——The anſwers of theſe Poſſeſt, are generally made in equivocal terms, " whenever the queſtions which are made them relate to futurity, in which circumſtance " they agree exactly with the oracles of the antient idolaters.

" [c] Of all the men who take upon themſelves to pronounce the decrees of fate, they put " the greateſt confidence in thoſe conjurers whopretend to diſcover all ſuch thieves as have " committed any ſecret robbery." After having try'd all the common and natural methods, they have recourſe to the following, of which Father Bouchet gives us the underwritten inſtance.

" Certain precious jewels had been ſo artfully and ſo privately ſtolen from the general " of the army of Maduras, that it was impoſſible to fix a ſuſpicion on any particular " perſon; and notwithſtanding the cloſeſt ſearch was made for the thief, they yet could " not get the leaſt intelligence who he was. At length, they conſulted one Ticherapali, a " young " young man, who was one of the moſt celebrated ſoothſayers in the whole country; ....

" this man gave ſo exact a deſcription of the thief, that he was eaſily found out. The un" happy wretch, who was not ſo much as ſuſpected, could not deny what the oracle had " pronounc'd; whereupon he confeſs'd his crime, and proteſted it had been diſcover'd in a " ſupernatural manner.

" When ſeveral are ſuſpected to have committed a robbery, andthat it cannot be fix'd " on one ſingle perſon, the Indians take the following method to find out the thief. They " write the names of all thoſe ſuſpected perſons on different pieces of paper, and lay them
" in a circular form; after which they conjure up the devil with the uſual ceremonies, and
" withdraw, after having ſhut up and cover'd the circle, ſo that no one can move any thing
" in it. They return ſome time after, uncover the circle, and he whoſe name is found " out of its place, is judg'd to be the criminal."

They have another manner of receiving the reſponſes of their Gods, and that is by the dreams of their prieſts. We ſhall not take notice of ſeveral operations, which the abovemention'd author relates to juſtify his opinion, viz. that the Devil pronounces oracles in India, which he thinks are certainly above all human power; tho' they may in reality be no more than ſo many tricks of hocus pocus, like to thoſe of our juglers in Europe. We are not afraid, tho' we deliver ourſelves with this freedom, of being look'd upon as ſo many free-thinkers, and as people whom an extravagant criticiſm has fill'd with a ſpirit of incredulity, even with regard to things of the greateſt notoriety, as Father Bouchet has expreſſed it. We believe that the Indian prieſts may be ſo far cheats, as to invent, without the aſſiſtance of the devil, many arts to deceive the people. If caves, ſubterraneous places, and the hollow of the ſtatues of the Indian gods, do not ſeem fit places for impoſing on the idolaters, it muſt be confeſs'd that the Indians are much more cunning than the Europeans: but after all, there are other artifices capable of producing the ſame effect.

Father Bouchet takes notice of another kind of oracle. " Certain penitents, ſays
" he, perform ſacrifices by the water ſide in a very ceremonious manner: Theſe draw
" a circle of one or two cubits in diameter. Round this circle they place their idols, ſo
" as to ſtand towards the eight principal points of the compaſs. The heathens are of " opinion, that the eight inferior deities preſide over theſe eight parts of the world " at equal diſtances one from the other. Theſe falſe divinities are invoked, when
" ſome one or other of theſe ſtatues moves every now and then before all the ſpectators,
" and turns about in the place where it ſtood, tho' no one comes near it. The Indians
" who perform theſe kind of ſacrifices, ſometimes place the ſtatue, in whoſe honour the " ſacrifice is perform'd, in the center of the circle. Whenever the little ſtatue moves of " itſelf, they imagine the gods have granted them an extraordinary favour. But it
" frequently happens, that tho' they offer up ever ſo many prayers, the ſtatue continues
" immoveable, which is a very unlucky omen."

The CONSECRATION of the ground on which they build their PAGODS. Divers obſervations relating to the PAGODS, &c.

The foregoing Diſſertations make no mention of the conſecration of the ground on which they build their pagods; but we muſt not omit this ceremony, and ſome other cuſtoms which will be mentioned in the ſequel. They firſt incloſe with boards or paliſadoes the ground on which the pagod is to be built, after which they let the graſs grow therein: as ſoon as the graſs is ſhot to a pretty great height, they turn an aſh-coloured cow into it, who ranges up and down, and ſpends the whole day and night there. The next day they view the place where the cow has laid down during the night, and as cow-dung is thought by the Indians to be of a very ſacred nature, they ſearch about very carefully, in order to find whether the cow has condeſcended to honour that place with the ſacred depoſit of her dung; after which they dig a deep pit, into which they put a marble pillar, that riſes at a conſiderable height above the ſurface of the earth. On this pillar they ſet the image or ſtatue of the god to whom the pagod is conſecrated: if 'tis dedicated to Ixora for inſtance, then, Quivelinga, whoſe poſture we have deſcribed, as far as decency would permit, is placed upon the pillar. After this the pagod is built quite round the pit in which the pillar is fixed. That part where the god reſides is very dark, but they light it up, purely to do him honour, as was before obſerved.

The pagods of thoſe who live on the coaſt of Malabar, are built of marble or hard ſtone; thoſe of the coaſt of Coromandel are made of huge pieces of ſtone, very cloſely cemented. Such is the pagod of Rammanakoil, the revenues of which amount to an immenſe ſum; and this pagod is as famous in India for the pilgrimages which are made to it, as our Lady of Loretto is among the Chriſtians. The pagods in Malabar are cover'd with plates of copper, and the gates of their greens which anſwer to the courts that were before the Jewiſh temples, are cover'd with the ſame metal. Theſe gates are generally made of marble, and are enrich'd with ſeveral figures of wild or monſtrous animals. On the front of the building, various kinds of monſters are repreſented, which are ſo many emblems of the gods of the Indians, and may poſſibly, at the ſame time, be of uſe to fill the minds of the people with a religious terror. 'Tis manifeſt from chapter the 8th, verſe the 10th of Ezekiel, that this kind of painting or ſculpture was in uſe among the antient idolaters, and there's no doubt but theſe ceremonies, which are ſo general all over the Eaſt, were originally borrowed from the Egyptians.

Beſides the great pagods, which may in ſome meaſure be conſider'd as ſo many pariſhes and cathedral churches, there are a numberleſs multitude of little ones, built up and down the fields and cities, all erected from various motives of piety. There are eſpecially great numbers of them about thoſe places where dead bodies have been burnt; and the great men in India have ſeveral, in which they perform their private devotions, and theſe have their particular prieſts, in the ſame manner as our chappels.

We have already obſerv'd, that the Indians bare their feet and legs before they enter into the pagod of Ixora; the ſame cuſtom is obſerv'd with regard to all other pagods: and as ablutions make one of the moſt eſſential parts of their religious worſhip, they always have ſeveral Tanks or reſervoirs of water dug for the uſe of the faithful. Linſchooten relates, that the prieſts of Calicut preſent conſecrated water to all who enter into the pagods, which cuſtom is pretty remarkable.

[a]The teachers make a pretty explicit diſtinction between venial and mortal ſins. Ablutions are adapted to both; as for inſtance, they pretend to expiate a petty ſin, and to ſink it, as it were, to the bottom, by plunging over head and ears in the Ganges, or ſome other ſacred river: but there are others of ſo black a dye, that no water can poſſibly waſh them out, be the ablutions ever ſo many times repeated; and the wretch who has arrived at ſuch a pitch of wickedneſs, is thrown out of his caſte, and certainly put to death. The Indians rank the following among the venial ſins; the ſuffering one's ſelf to be touched by an impure perſon, the touching a dead body, (nay, ſo ſqueamiſh are they on this head, that they refrain from all communication with the relations of the deceaſed for a fortnight together) the coming near a woman in childbed, or the touching her child. The ſame number of days is obſerv'd with regard to them, which cuſtom is agreeable to that of the Jews on the ſame occaſion. They alſo conſider as a venial ſins, the coming near a woman who has her naturalia; the touching of thoſe who have touch'd unclean perſons. If any perſon, regardleſs of the uncleanneſs he may have contracted, preſumes to eat rice before he has purified himſelf, he is guilty of a mortal ſin. All perſons of diſtinction, who eat rice prepar'd by people of an inferior caſte, or have have any commerce with women of a meaner extraction than their own, contract the ſame guilt. Any one who mixes together rice which was put into different [a] diſhes, and afterwards eats it, commits a mortal ſin. If ſeveral Bramins, tho' all of the ſame caſte, eat together, they commit a ſin; and if any one preſumes to touch with his right hand, (which is the hand they eat with) the perſon who ſits next to them, ſuch action is alſo looked upon as ſinful.

When the meal is ended, they are obliged to gather up all the rice that is left, and throw it away as a thing unclean. They clean with very freſh cow-dung, the place where they had eat; and tho' no more than a ſingle grain of rice, of that which they had fed upon, were to fall upon a perſon, that alone would make him unclean; and the perſon thus polluted, muſt run that moment to the water and waſh himſelf thoroughly. If a perſon puts his finger into his mouth, he thereby pollutes himſelf. If two perſons of different caſtes waſh together, and that he of the inferior tribe happens to ſpurt water on the other, the latter is thereby rendred wholly unclean, and the ablution muſt in this caſe be perform'd over again.

The MANNER how ABLUTIONS are perform'd by the Heathens of MALABAR.

[b] We before took notice of certain [c] reſervoirs of water, which the Indians call Tanks. When the Malabarians waſh themſelves in theſe, they are quite naked, ſave only a piece of linnen cloth, of about two or three fingers breadth, which they wind round their bodies. Theſe, before they go into the water, ſhake a little of it into the air, with three fingers of the right hand, in honour of Brama, Viſtnou, and Ixora, pronouncing the following words at the ſame time; In drawing near this water, and touching it, I renounce all my ſins. We muſt not omit three particulars, which they believe concerning Tanks. 1. That the ſtone which ſtands near theſe reſervoirs of water is Brama. 2. That the place in which they waſh themſelves is Viſtnou. And 3. that the Tank itſelf is Ixora. At their firſt going into the water they divide it with their two hands, and immediately plunge into it, after which they take water and throw it eight times into the air, for the ſake of thoſe [d] eight Beings who preſide over the univerſe: which being done, they waſh their faces thrice, invoking at the ſame time Siri Pagod, Viſtnou's wife. In fine, they take water a third time, and throw it towards heaven, as an offering to the ſun. They then rub their hands and feet with cow-dung aſhes, diluted in a little water, crying out at the ſame time, be purified. They muſt put theſe aſhes in the hollow of the left hand; the right, according to the Indians, being the image of heaven, and the left of the earth. They likewiſe ſay, that the hollow of the latter repreſents the part where generation is performed. The right hand laid upon the left, forms the complete figure of the egg which we have already deſcribed, under the name of Ixoretta, when we mentioned that Divinity. It was neceſſary to give the reader this hint, in order for his better underſtanding what we ſhall hereafter mention on the ceremony of the Indian purification. Theſe, after taking ſome cow-dung aſhes, preſs the right hand againſt the left, imagining they then repreſent heaven and earth joined together. They afterwards disjoin them, and ſay that this repreſents the ſeparation of heaven and earth. They afterwards write the two following ſyllables on the aſhes which they have in the hollow of their left hand, viz. Ja-ra, which theſe idolaters ſay, expreſs the combat between the [b] Baldæus's Deſcription of Malabar. The ablutions of the Bramins are taken notice of in the Diſſertation on their Religion and Cuſtoms, Chap. X. Part I. but with ſome difference.

[c] They nevertheleſs uſe the running ſtream as often as opportunity permits, and fancy the waſhing in theſe to be more meritorious than the bathing in any ſtanding water. Poſſibly the Indian Legiſlators may in this caſe have had a view to what was proper and convenient for their country, for all that is required in India is only the waſhing and bathing one's-ſelf. See Bernier's Voyages to Mogul, Vol. 2. p. 138. Dutch edition printed in 1709.

the fire and the air in the egg, before they were dis-united. This writing being ended, they then lay their hands on every part of the body; first a little above the navel, afterwards on the navel itself, on the hollow of the stomach, on the breast, the forehead, the head, the crown of the head, the eyes, the ears and the lower parts of the body. While all this is doing, they turn themselves towards the eight governors of the world, and show their hands are empty in the attitude of a person who bestows. They conclude the purification by taking up ashes with three fingers of the right hand, with which they rub their foreheads, their shoulders, and breasts, in honour of Brama, of Wistnou, and Ixora.

The HOLY ASHES, &c.

From what has been said, 'tis pretty evident that cow-dung ashes are look'd upon to be of a very holy nature; [a] and indeed the Indians sprinkle their foreheads, and both their shoulders, and breasts with them every morning. These ashes are daily offer'd to the Gods, and the Joguis seldom fail of having a good stock of them by them, in order to distribute them among the devotees, who always reward them very liberally with alms. The Joguis also affect to cover their faces and bodies with these ashes, and also scatter them over their idols. In fine, we shall observe that in the courts of several Indian princes, certain persons are appointed to present regularly these ashes diluted in a little water, and laid on the leaves of an Indian fig-tree. This ceremony is perform'd publickly and in the morning, in order that all their devotees may partake of this salutary unction. 'Twou'd be needless to trouble the reader with the fabulous stories by which they endeavour to give a reason for the institution of this custom, therefore I shall refer him to Baldæus.

Whenever the king or Samorin of Calicut goes to pay his devotions in the pagod, all the way through which he passes is purified with fresh cow-dung: this being done, two women walk before his majesty, carrying two vessels full of this cow-dung diluted in water, and scatter it before him. The king is fasting, but the ablution was perform'd before. In fine, not to trouble the reader any farther with the sacred qualities of cow-dung, 'twill be sufficient to observe, that the Indian idolaters employ it in every thing which requires purification. They also use it for the cleaning their houses, their moveables and utensils.

Every part of the body of a cow is inhabited by some deity or other. As for instance, Quenevady and Superhennia reside between its horns, the sun and moon in its eyes, Brama's two wives in its ears, Ixora in its nose, Wistnou on its tongue, &c. But were not all these silly particulars the dreams of some Indian poet? perhaps too they meant no more in it, than to express the excellent properties of this animal. Be that as it will, cow's piss is of so sacred a nature, that those among them who are inspired with a true spirit of devotion, make no scruple of pouring it into their hands, washing their faces, and even drinking it.

The Malabarians assert, that kings are bound to be the protectors of cows and Bramins. The Samorin abovementioned [b], offers flowers to those animals every morning.

The FEASTS, FASTS, and other Religious Practices of the INDIANS.

Here follows some additions to what has been already related on this head, in the Dissertation on the Religion and Manners of the Bramins. The Indians have a kind of carnaval call'd Huli. The engraver has exactly express'd all the different postures of their carnaval in a former plate.

They

[a] Baldæus ubi supra.

[b] Six of the Samorin's pages adorn'd with these flowers, and powder'd, if I may use the expression, with cow-dung ashes, present themselves daily at this prince's levee, who afterwards sends them to present flowers to his cows.

They ſalute the ſun every morning, and throw up water to that planet whenever they perform their ablutions, in order to prevent the evil Genii who inhabit between the mountains from oppoſing his riſing.

The Indians are extremely ſuperſtitious with regard to [a] eclipſes, and redouble their ablutions whenever theſe happen. Bernier has deſcrib'd the whole ceremony of one of theſe ablutions. " The moment theſe idolaters perceiv'd that the ſun began to be " eclips'd, they made a great ſhout, plung'd themſelves immediately over head and " ears into the water, and ſtanding upright in it, their hands and eyes liſted up towards " the ſun, they mutter'd out their prayers, took up water every now and then, and threw " it up towards the planet of the day." While this was performing, they held down their heads, and made ſeveral motions with their arms. After this they again repeated their prayers, plung'd themſelves afreſh, and continued ſo to do till the eclipſe was over. Then they all withdrew, having firſt thrown ſeveral pieces of ſilver a conſiderable way into the water, and given alms to the Bramins, who never fail to aſſiſt at this devout ſolemnity. The Indians were no ſooner come out of the water, but they chang'd their clothes; and ſuch as were moſt charitable, gave thoſe they had pull'd off to the Bramins.

The Indians imagine that the eclipſe of the ſun is [b] owing to the malice of an evil Genius, who abuſes that ſtar and gives it that black colour. They are firmly perſuaded, that the great ſource of light muſt certainly ſuffer the moſt dreadful torments in this diſtreſs; and conſequently that 'tis the duty of every faithful Indian to endeavour at its deliverance: and this they are ſure of obtaining by prayers, alms and ablutions. All theſe actions are infinitely more meritorious during the time of an eclipſe than on any other occaſion.

The devotees among the Indians are oblig'd to offer up their prayers thrice a day, i. e. in the morning, at noon, and at night, with their faces turn'd eaſtward, and are to waſh themſelves as many times.

[c] They keep ſeveral faſts, one of the chief whereof is Egadexi, a word ſignifying eleven. This faſt is obſerv'd the 11th of the full moon, and the 11th of the new, ſo that they faſt twice every moon. They then make but one meal, which is always at four or five a-clock in the afternoon; but they are not allow'd any other food except beans, peas, milk and fruits; and drinks of every kind are alſo forbid them during theſe ſeaſons of penance. The fabulous original which they aſcribe to this faſt, is too trifling to be taken notice of in this place.

[d] The faſt call'd by them Quiveraſiri, falls in the month of February, and is very ſevere. They are not allow'd either to eat or lie down for four and twenty hours, during which they relate the fabulous hiſtories of their Gods, and of their tribes. They go ſeveral times in proceſſion round their pagods, and viſit them all night long till they ſee the dawn appear. 'Tis then they ſacrifice to their Gods, offer them money, and give alms to the prieſts, which concludes the whole faſt.

[e] The women have a particular faſt day, call'd Tirinadira; 'tis kept on the 27th of the moon, in commemoration of the death and reſurrection of Canteven, who is the Cupid of the Indians of Malabar and of Coromandel. 'Tis related, that Ixora being jealous of certain familiarities which were obſerved between his wife Parameſceri and Cupid, burnt the amorous God with a glance from the eye which is plac'd in the midſt of his forehead. The diſconſolate Parameſceri could not ſurvive the loſs of the fond God; but ſome time after, went to a mountain and there obtain'd a ſecond birth. Here the unhappy Goddeſs ſpent her days in retirement and penance, with a firm perſuaſion that abſence, and a ſpecious appearance of remorſe, would cure her husband's jealouſy; and indeed Ixora's anger began to cool, and was no longer able to reſiſt that conjugal tenderneſs tenderneſs which again began to revive in his heart. He was vanquiſh'd by her endearing ſoftneſs, and promis'd to be a more kind husband for the future, and to reſtore the family to that tranquility which he, by a fit of ill humour, had interrupted. The reſult of the whole, was, that he confeſs'd his fault with the beſt grace imaginable, and as a pledge of this renewal of their conjugal fondneſs, he conſented that Cupid ſhould again be rais'd from the dead. Thrice happy in being a cuckold, and at the ſame time contented with his being ſo!

[a] The faſt of Maſaupada is as holy a faſt as the three abovemention'd. Their devotees are oblig'd to obſerve it regularly for twelve years together, after which they may reſt aſſured, that the Gods will multiply in an extraordinary manner thoſe years, and alſo the bleſſings of life. Here follows the whole of this devotion. They begin a faſt the laſt day of October which continues to the tenth of December following. They are oblig'd to waſh themſelves daily, to change their cloaths, and viſit a pagod ſacred to Viſtnou. In the morning, the devotee cloath'd in very neat and clean apparel, goes an hundred and one times round this holy pagod; but thoſe of the moſt conſummate piety, go a thouſand and one times. While this duty is performing, they are obliged to mumble over ſoftly one of Viſtnou's myſterious names an hundred and one times, and be very careful they are not overheard. The devotee is to eat nothing but figs and milk, muſt abſtain from all commerce with women, muſt let Viſtnou be his only theme, and be eternally ſinging his praiſes. The ſecond year the faſt begins on the firſt of December, and ends the tenth of January: the third, the firſt of January, and ends the 10th of February; and ſo on to the twelfth year. Maſaupada ſignifies the month of faſting.

The STUDY of the BRAMINS.

We ſhall conclude theſe remarks on the religious ceremonies of the Indians of Malabar, and Coromandel, with a curſory view of the ſtudies of the Bramins.

[b] The city of Benares or Benarous, ſituated on the Ganges in Bengal, is the general ſchool, and, as it were, the Athens of the heathens of India, and is [c] therefore frequented by all thoſe Bramins and Religious, whoſe inclinations lead them to ſtudy. There are no colleges nor ſchools in the Eaſt Indies as among us in Europe; but the maſters and doctors are diſpers'd up and down the city of Benares, and live chiefly in the gardens or the ſuburbs. Some of theſe doctors have four pupils, others ſix or ſeven, and the moſt eminent among them twelve or fifteen at moſt, who ſtudy ten or twelve years under their maſters. "Their ſtudy in general, according to Bernier, is carried on after a very cold "and languid manner, which is owing to the laggiſh and indolent diſpoſition of the "greateſt part of the Indians, to which the heat of the country, and their diet do not a "little contribute: And as they are not like the Europeans excited to labour from a "principle of emulation, and that hope which we entertain of making a conſiderable "progreſs; they therefore ſtudy at their eaſe, and without torturing their brains, while "they eat their Kichery, or mixtures of pulſe, which wealthy merchants provide for "them." Nevertheleſs, ſeveral travellers, and among the reſt the miſſionaries, ſpeak very advantageouſly of the vivacity and penetration of theſe Indians, a caſt of mind much more natural to the heat of the Southern climates, than to the cold of our Northern ones. As to emulation, and the hopes of making a progreſs, poſſibly theſe are unknown in Mogul, where heatheniſm is not predominant; but 'tis different in other parts of India, where the ſtudies of the Bramins are had in great eſteem, and generally pave the way to every thing which may flatter the pride and vanity of men.

"Their

[c] In a deſcription of the Indies, written by a Mahometan, and tranſlated into French by M. Renaudot, printed in 1718, mention is made of Canouge, as a city peopled with Indian poets and philoſophers. Notice is alſo taken there of certain academies of Sarendip or Ceylan, which in all probability don't ſubſiſt at this time.

" Their firſt ſtudy, ſays Bernier, is the Hanſcrit, which is a language that bears no " manner of affinity with the Indian tongue that is generally ſpoken, and is known only " to their Literati." In which reſpect, it may be conſider'd in the ſame light as the Hebrew, the Greek, and Latin in Europe.

" Hanſcrit is as much as to ſay the pure tongue; they call it after this manner, and " even give it the name of holy and divine language, becauſe they are of opinion that " God, by Brama's intervention, publiſh'd the four [a] Beths, or ſacred books in this " tongue." So that this language and theſe books are exactly the ſame with regard to them, as the Hebrew and the bible are with us. " They pretend that this language is as " antient as Brama, whoſe age they always reckon by Lecks, or hundreds of thouſand " years . . . . . Be that as it will, we muſt allow it to be of great antiquity, ſince the " books of their religion, which are undoubtedly ſo, are written only in that tongue; " not to mention the philoſophical, phyſical, poetical, and a great number of books in " other faculties, are all written in it, a great hall in Benares being fill'd with them.

" After they have learn'd the Hanſcrit, which is a very laborious task, becauſe they " have no good grammar of it; they generally apply themſelves to read the Purance, " which is a kind of gloſſary, and abridgment of the Beths; for theſe Beths are huge " volumes, if thoſe, ſays Bernier, were the Beths, which I was ſhewn at Benares: they " are vaſtly ſcarce, and my Aga could never meet with them, tho' he did all that lay in his " power to purchaſe a ſett; and indeed they conceal them very cloſely, for fear of their " falling into the hands of the Mahometans, who frequently commit them to the flames. " Some, after having read the Purance, apply themſelves to the ſtudy of philoſophy, " but here they make but a very ſlender progreſs."

From their ſix moſt celebrated philoſophers, ſix different ſects have ſprung, each whereof have their followers, who are all poſſeſs'd with that ſpirit of jealouſy and prejudice which prevails in other countries; each of them flatters himſelf he has truth on his ſide, and fancies he has hit on the true ſenſe of thoſe books in which the myſteries of that philoſophy are compriz'd better than the reſt. Beſides theſe ſix ſects, there is another in Mogul, which is divided into twelve branches, " but this ſect is not ſo " numerous as the reſt, its followers are hated and deſpis'd, look'd upon as atheiſts and " people of no manner of religion, &c.

" The books wherein the tenets of all theſe various ſects are contain'd, treat of the " firſt principles of things, but after a very different manner: Some hold that all things " are compos'd of little indiviſible bodies, not becauſe of their ſolidity . . . . . but in " proportion to their ſmallneſs, in which they agree pretty nearly with the opinions of " Democritus and Epicurus, but in ſo confus'd a manner . . . . . that one ſcarce knows " what to adhere to . . . . . which poſſibly may be as much the fault of their doctors, as " of the authors they interpret. Others teach, that all things are compos'd of matter " and form . . . . . There are others again who teach, that all things are compos'd of the " four elements, and of non-entity . . . . . which is almoſt the ſame as our privation. " They admit various manners of this non-entity; ſome hold that light and darkneſs " are the firſt principles of all things . . . . . others admit privation, or rather privations, " which they diſtinguiſh from non-entity. There are ſtill others, who pretend that all " things are compos'd of accidents . . . . . but they are univerſally agreed that theſe " principles are eternal . . . . . They have a great number of little treatiſes of phyſic, " but theſe are rather collections of preſcriptions than any thing elſe; the chief, and at " the ſame time the moſt antient is written in verſe;" as was formerly the cuſtom of ſeveral people of Europe, who ranking phyſic among the divine myſteries, us'd to work up its doctrine in the ingenious obſcurity of poeſy. For which reaſon, the prieſts among the Gauls, the Greeks, and Egyptians, were phyſicians at the ſame time, as is ſtill the cuſtom cuſtom in America, which has been already obſerv'd. " The practice of theſe Indians " differs pretty much from ours; the principles which they have eſtabliſh'd are as " follows; that a perſon who is ſick of a fever does not require much nouriſhment; that " abſtinence is the beſt remedy againſt diſeaſes; that nothing can be worſe for a ſick " perſon than meat broths, or ſooner putrifies in the ſtomach of one who has a fever; " that bleeding ſhould never be us'd but in caſes of the greateſt neceſſity, ſuch as " when there is any fear of a patient's being delirious, or when they find there is an " inflammation in the breaſt, the liver or the loins." 'Twould be to no purpoſe to aſſert that this practice is not the propereſt in ſeveral caſes; it ſucceeds in the Indies, which ſufficiently juſtifies it againſt our notions on this head.

The Indians have no manner of skill in anatomy, the reaſon of which is, becauſe they never open either human or any other bodies.

" As to aſtronomy, they have their tables, by which they foretel eclipſes; and tho' " they may not calculate them with ſo great a nicety as the European mathematicians, " 'tis certain they come pretty near the matter; however, they argue in the ſame manner " on the eclipſe of the moon, as on that of the ſun; they aſſert that 'tis owing to its " being barbarouſly treated by a black and ugly devil . . . . . They likewiſe affirm, " that the moon is four hundred thouſand coſſes above the [a] ſun, i. e. upwards of fifty " thouſand leagues; that its light is not borrow'd, and that 'tis hence we receive a " certain vital water, which . . . . . is congregated in the brain; whence it deſcends, as " from a ſource, into the ſeveral limbs for their reſpective functions. They moreover " aſſert that the ſun, the moon, and all the ſtars in general are Deutas, i. e. Genii." Theſe two laſt opinions are neither new, nor peculiar to the Indian doctors. " They " pretend, that night is made by the ſun's withdrawing himſelf behind a mountain, " ſituated in the midſt of the earth, which mountain is ſeveral thouſand leagues in height, " and is ſhap'd like an inverted cone, ſo that they never have day, but when the ſun " comes from behind that mountain.

" They believe that the earth is a flat ſuperficies, and of a triangular form; that it has " ſeven ſtories, all which differ in beauty, in perfection, and in the inhabitants with " which they are peopled; and that each of them has a ſea round it." The reader may turn to what was before obſerv'd of theſe ſeas, of the mountain plac'd in the midſt of the earth, and of the different orders of ſpirits, of Genii, and of ſubaltern Gods who inhabit theſe ſeas. All theſe notions, when taken in a literal ſenſe, make an odd jumble of nonſenſe; but ought they not to be conſider'd in the ſame light, as thoſe deſcriptions we meet with in books of devotion, and even the ſcriptures? What reply could we make to the Indians, if, becauſe our Saviour has ſaid that [b] a river of living water ſhould flow from the man who believ'd in him, a Mogul painter ſhould repreſent a good chriſtian diſſolving away in water, and his belly as an ever-running ſpring? Might we not juſtly laugh at the artiſt? However, we venture to argue after this manner, but don't at the ſame time endeavour to account for all the abſurdities in the ſyſtems which the heathens have form'd to themſelves.

" Their chronology is as erroneous as their geography, they don't aſſert that the " world is eternal, but they tell us that 'tis of vaſt antiquity; it will, ſay they, laſt four " Dgugnes, each Dgugne containing an hundred Lecks, i. e. an hundred times an " hundred thouſand years:" Nevertheleſs they are not exactly agreed with regard to the world's duration. But we ſhall obſerve by the way, that all the antient as well as modern Eaſterns, univerſally aſcribe a greater antiquity to the world than we do, which is ſo much the more ſurprizing, ſince it ſeems natural to think that the Aſiaticks ſhould have preſerv'd, either by tradition or ſome other means, more exact monuments upon this head.

The

[a] It ſhould perhaps be beneath. Vide the Diſſertation on the Gods of the East-Indians.

[b] He that believeth on me, as the ſcripture hath ſaid, out of his belly ſhall flow rivers of living water, John VII. 38.

The notions they have of Genii and demons are very ridiculous and confus'd; " theſe, " ſay they, are of three kinds, viz. good, bad and indifferent . . . . . According to " ſome, they are made of fire, or as others ſay of light; many affirm they are " incorruptible; others, that they are even portions or parts of the Deity; in fine, others, " that they are ſo many Deities, ſeparated and diſpers'd up and down the world."

As to phyſics, their notions are, that the ſeveral individuals of each ſpecies, whenever have exiſted, or ſhall exiſt to the end of ages, were created from the beginning of the world. But to paraphraſe this notion, they believe that all theſe individuals were comprehended in the firſt or original bud of each ſpecies, and that they only unfold themſelves in the time appointed by heaven, in order to fill up that place in the world, for which they had been predeſtinated.

INDEX

A.

ABLUTIONS, how perform'd by the women of Malabar, 438, and 439.

Adorations in India, 434.

Ages of the world according to the Bramins, 343. Four in number. Their names. We are now in the fourth. Prodigious duration of each. Various degrees of virtue aſcribed to each. The univerſe is like an egg. Fourteen worlds. Their names. Golden fruits on mount Meronva. Their wonderful property. The ſeas of water, milk, butter, curdled milk, wine, ſyrup and ſalt-water. The end of the world far removed, ibid. Deſcription of the laſt day, 344.

Americans, their original, 1. The moderns excel the antients in navigation. Diſcoveries made by the antients, vaſtly inferior to thoſe of the moderns. Antients had little knowledge in aſtronomy. Some of their diſcoveries owing to chance, ibid. Probable the antients were unacquainted with America, 2. The predictions of Seneca the tragic writer, the product of fancy. How America was firſt peopled, we cannot tell. Some hints on their original. The conformity of their cuſtoms with the people of our hemiſphere. Purchas thinks America has not been long peopled. Otherwiſe why ſo many deſarts in the midſt of it? Or had not colonies ſent to it? The Mexicans cannot trace a thouſand years backward. Theſe reaſons invalidated: 1*ſt*, The inhabitants of America thinn'd by their bloody wars, and their devouring one another. 2*dly*, Not probable that Mexico and Peru were deſart 4 or 5000 years. No people, the Jews and Chineſe excepted, can trace higher than 2000 years. Many ages required for the eſtabliſhment of the different nations in America. The Spaniards found the iſlands thereof well peopled. The great variety of languages among them conſider'd, could not arrive at the perfection they were in, in 7 or 800 years. Reflections on the European languages, ibid. To prove the antiquity of thoſe of America, 3. Probably, colonies came firſt to America by land. That Phenician ſailors were caſt there by a ſtorm. Some probability of this from the hiſtory of the Americans. Thoſe men ſuppoſed to be giants, ſome would think the Canaanites, whom Joſhua had forced from their dwellings, ſettled in Peru. The Americans could make but very ſhort voyages, having but little veſſels, ibid. Why America was peopled by the Phenicians and Carthaginians, n. page 3. Becauſe of the long voyages of thoſe people to the Canary Iſlands, &c. Arguments againſt it. That thoſe people rather ſailed to the ſouthern parts of Africa. Other arguments to prove it probable that they might have been there. That the ancients always endeavoured to ſet the foundation of famous cities and great men in the moſt conſpicuous light, and that the vulgar were fond of the deceit, ibid. Difficult to know when America was firſt peopled, 4. The Peruvian annals ſcarce comprehend four centuries. Affinity between the cuſtoms of the Phenicians and Americans. Both live in huts, and rove from place to place. That of languages not to be depended upon. Some Phenician words in the American tongue. Some think the Americans owe their original to the ten diſperſed tribe of Iſrael, ibid. The Americans ſay, that ſix perſons ſaved themſelves in a general deluge, n. 4. The delightfulneſs of the American climate, ſuppoſed to invite the Carthaginians thither, ibid. Some traces of the Jewiſh religion found in Jucatan, 5. Emanuel de Moraes thinks the Jews ſettled in Braſil. His reaſons from the conformity of their cuſtoms in marriages, mournings, &c. Theſe affinities however of little weight. Grotius his opinion of the original of the Americans. That the inhabitants of Panama and Mexico came originally from the north. De Laat ſeems to have refuted Grotius's opinion. Grotius thinks the Peruvians came originally from China. His reaſons, from the ſprightly and penetrating genius of both; worſhip, hieroglyphicks, particularly their great law-giver Manecocapac. De Laat's refutation of this. That the Peruvians were never as ſkilful artiſts as the Chineſe. De Laat refuted. The Peruvians did not underſtand navigation, ibid. The Chineſe veſſels cannot perform long voyages, 6. The idolatry of the Chineſe different from that of the Peruvians. The latter ignorant of the art of writing. Original of the Americans vaſtly obſcure. They regard the time preſent only. Original of the European nations not well known. Difference between the Americans and ourſelves. The Greeks and Romans could not boaſt a very great antiquity. The author's own notion of the original of the Americans. That America was very populous a few centuries after the flood. How peopled. Kingdoms form'd. In the infant ages of the world, husbandry was the only employment. How the firſt conqueſts were made in Aſia. A rich ſhepherd ſends away a ſon, or a dependant, to a great diſtance with a numerous flock. From this flock another ſprings, ibid. 7. The ſhepherd thus detach'd, grows rich, and ſends away in like manner a ſon or ſervant with a flock, 7. and ſo on; by which means Europe, Aſia, Africa, and America were peopled in two centuries. A computation how the poſterity of Noah may have peopled the three former with thirty-two millions of inhabitants in 150 years. Biſhop Burnet's travels quoted on this occaſion. Arguments to ſupport this computation, from the ordinary courſe of nature. That part of Noah's poſterity abovementioned, probably went to ſeek their fortunes in America. How theſe might people it. That mankind were much more robuſt and vigorous in thoſe days. Health not prejudiced by luxury, ib. Theſe colonies paſs'd into America by the way of Tartary, 8. Reaſons of it. From Father Hennepin, who relates that four ſavages came as ambaſſadors to the Iſſatis, and made a prodigious long journey by land. That there are no ſtraits of Anian. That the ſavages abovementioned inhabit the north of California, which extends, perhaps, to the frontiers of Tartary, &c. This conjecture probable. The north part of Japan ſtill undiſcover'd. The Japaneſe themſelves ſay that the people who live to the north of their country, inhabit a country of a vaſt extent. The Japaneſe as little acquainted with thoſe countries as

as the Europeans. This country muſt extend 12 or 1300 leagues, from California to Tartary. Proofs that the land of Jeſſo and Japan are join'd, ibid. Tartary may be called the nurſery of all nations, 9. The old world govern'd by nations who came originally from Tartary. Tartarians and Americans lead much the ſame life. Both continually in wars. A ſimilitude from their face and ſhapes. Proved from European people, viz. the Lombards, Gaſcoons, Spaniards, Normans, Granadans, Turks. New-comers acquire inſenſibly the air and cuſtoms of the people whom they ſettle among, yet ſtill preſerve a tincture of their original. Prov'd from the Italians. Frobiſher's deſcription of the Americans. Cuſtoms to prove the Americans of Tartarian extraction, ibid. Domeſticks of monarchs buried with them, 10. Both deſpiſe riches, trade, the ſciences; but love hunting, &c. Several Europeans painted their bodies. Irreconcilable hatred of both; contempt of death; drink the blood of their enemies, &c. Etymologies from Vander Myl, very trifling. Goropius Becanus ſeized with the ſame etymological frenzy. Derives the Hebrew from the Flemiſh. Etymologiſts banter'd. Madoc, of Welch extraction, ſails to America in 1170, ibid. and 11. Engliſh left there. A few Welch words in the American tongues. Americans ador'd the croſs. Spaniards ſaid to have found St. Andrew's croſs at their arrival in America. They alſo met with ſome negroes. That the poſterity of the Laplanders or Samoieds may have gone to America. Americans think they came originally from lakes or fountains, ibid.

Annemonta, or the wind, its original, 342. An ape aſſiſts Viſnou in his wars, and has a pagod erected in his honour. The ſons of Eſtara honour'd, ibid. Fluttering devils once human ſouls, 343.

Antiquity, if any footſteps of it are remaining in the world, to be found among thoſe who inhabit deſarts, 196.

Aſhes, the holy aſhes in India, 439.

Aurengzeb, the Great Mogul, 199. Son to Chah-Jehan, ſon of Jehan-Guire. Chah-Jehan rebels againſt his father, who dies. Jehan-Guire's grandſon raiſed to the throne. Chah-Jehan takes him priſoner, and ſtrangles him, and reigns in peace, when his four ſons rebel againſt him, of whom Aurengzeb was the third. His brothers diſcovers openly their deſire of reigning. Aurengzeb puts on the mask of hypocriſy, and turns Faquir or poor fryar, when he artfully exaſperates his brethren againſt one another, ibid. Whilſt theſe diviſions continued, Aurengzeb adhered always to the weakeſt ſide, 200. Bribes privately as many of his father's friends as he could. Finding himſelf ſtrong enough, he throws off the mask, and fights for the crown. Throws his father Chah-Jehan into priſon, who dies ſix years after in it. He attemps to ſeize his brothers. The eldeſt taken and poiſon'd. Overcomes the reſt. Aurengzeb proclaimed Great Mogul in 1660. A great politician. Reproach'd with ruining his family. Aurengzeb compared to pope Sixtus the V. Both gain'd a crown by pretending to decline it. Neither reveal'd himſelf till he was fix'd in the throne. Rendred their dominions flouriſhing; were dreaded by their ſubjects and neighbours; were cruel, and yet gain'd immortal glory. Aurengzeb made great conqueſts, ibid.

B.

BANIANS, a people of India, from Mr. Lord's relation, 277. Are meanly habited. Deſpiſed by the Mahometans. Profeſs great probity. Employ'd as brokers. Are great cheats, ibid.

Banians or Shudderys, the third Indian caſte, 304. Are merchants or brokers. An innocent and harmleſs people. The ſame number of caſts as the Banians. Odd way of buying and ſelling, ibid.

Banians, reflections on their principles, 308. Their firſt age a figment of their own deviſing. Peopling of the world by placing four women at the four winds, ridiculous. The ſame of the ſecond age. Their tenets ſilly and ſuperſtitious. Their fondneſs for the number four. The peruſal of the abſurdity of the Banian religion, may ſtrengthen Chriſtians in theirs, ibid.

Baſtards—Notions which different nations have of them, 48. Injuſtice of the Europeans with regard to them. Some American nations very jealous on this head. Conduct of the Jews and Chriſtians with regard to baſtards. Whim of the Mahometans. The continual cuckoldom of the heathen gods. Ancients, who gloried in being thought the ſpurious offspring of gods. Lacedemonians allow their wives to proſtitute themſelves with their ſlaves, but ſend the children away, ibid.

Beauty of the Americans, 32. Some reflections on beauty in general. As ſome beauties pleaſe all men, ſo deformity may appear ſo to all eyes. That we could never admire monſters. The beaſts abhor deformity. Objected, that the author of nature might have made all men deform'd. Anſwer to it. Thoſe ſavages who bruiſe the noſes of their children, have not a juſt idea of proportion, ibid. Verſes upon beauty, n. ib. Odd taſte of the Africans. Whimſical cuſtom of the Miſſiſippians, who make their children's heads into the form of a cone, which puts 'em to dreadful pain. Some Americans ſmear themſelves with greaſe and oil, ibid. Reaſons why the negroes are black, 33. From the burning ſands in Africa, and the few rivers. Thought alſo to proceed from the climate they inhabit. Americans have generally long, black hair. Europeans very whimſical in their taſte, with regard to the beauty of hair. Difficult to determine whether the fair or brown are moſt beautiful. Diſtich from Fontenelle. Ancient poets generally made their goddeſſes fair. Beards in no repute among the Savages, ibid. The Americans look upon them with veneration, 34. The ancients lov'd large blue eyes. The French admired greeniſh eyes formerly. A large black eye now moſt eſteem'd. The Americans are tall, well-ſhap'd, nimble, and active. Thoſe who inhabit the mountains, very nimble. Men depend much on the ſoil. Were the inhabitants of valleys to be carried upon mountains, and vice-verſa, they'd be very much changed, That nations may change their manners entirely. Prov'd from Ammianus Marcellinus, and Cæſar, ibid. Exemplified in the Gauls and modern French, 35. Reflections on the fickleneſs of the French, with regard to dreſs, which they make a very ſerious article, from Monſ. Muralt, n. ibid. The poſterity of robuſt people may be very weak, which may be owing to ſeveral cauſes. The American nations not ſuſceptible to theſe changes, becauſe they adhere ſtrictly to nature. Are almoſt as unpoliſh'd as brutes. Sneer upon our European debauchees, ib. The French vaſtly polite in the moſt inſignificant trifles, ſuch as in taking up a glove, &c. Compar'd to flies playing in the ſun, and the toys and knick-knacks which come from their country, n. ibid.

Belief of the Apalachites, 121. The immortality of the ſoul. Habitations for the good and the bad. Heaven call'd the high-world, and hell the low-world, ibid.

Belief of the Virginians, 113. That the ſoul is immortal. Popoguſſo, or their hell, is a great ditch the wicked ſouls burn in. Some ſay they hang between heaven and hell. Kings and prieſts go to paradiſe. They rejoice to all eternity, which conſiſts in being crown'd with feathers, having their faces ſmear'd, having pipes and tobacco, &c. ibid.

Black

Black, uſed by the Indians to adorn their complexions, 228. Jezebel's painting her face. The Indian women colour their eyes round with black. Their looking-glaſſes, ibid. Reflections on thoſe women, who uſed to pray at the door of the tabernacle, 229.

Bouchet the jeſuit's letter concerning the idolaters in India, and to prove that their fictions are borrowed from the Jews or Chriſtians, to M. Huet biſhop of Avranches, from 397, to 407.

Brama, ſeveral particulars concerning that god, 408. That he is the ſame with Pythagoras. This refuted. That he was Hermes Triſmegiſtus, Xaca, or Xekia, ibid. Brama has the direction of the fate of mankind, 409. Their idea of the creation of the world. Particulars of that ingenious ſection. Vide the note [b] for the philoſophical notion of the Bramins, with regard to the bud of the world. Brama, how imaged, ibid. & 410.

Bramins, 245. Succeſſors of the ancient Brachmans. The celebrated Apollonius went thro' Scythia, ibid. And thence among the Brachmans, 246. Sees the learned Hiarchus ſitting on his golden throne, and inſtructing ſome choſen diſciples in the ſecrets of nature. Apollonius having paſs'd the river Indus, enter'd into the country once govern'd by Porus, conquer'd by Alexander the Great. That kingdom govern'd by Pharaates. The excellent qualities of that prince. His palace, and the temple dedicated to the ſun. Apollonius travels towards the river Hyſpaſis. Sees a monument raiſed by Alexander the Great. The inſcription on it. Comes to Hiarchus's court, and converſes with the Bramins on the tranſmigration of ſouls, and the formation of the world, ibid. They admitted five elements, 247. The firſt element a kind of very thin ætherial ſubſtance. The gods and heavenly genii form'd of it. From whom the Brachmans are deſcended. The modern Bramins have preſerved ſome noble fragments of the knowledge of the ancient Brachmans, ibid. The conformity exemplify'd in ſeveral particulars, n. ibid. Are skilful arithmeticians. Calculate eclipſes. Have ſeveral books on morality, &c. Studies of the Chaldeans, Aſſyrians, Perſians, Greeks, ibid. The latter wrote chiefly on the amorous intrigues of their deities. Conduct of their firſt hiſtorians. Benares the only college the Bramans have. The Indians very credulous with regard to Taliſmans. The Brachmans had great skill in the occult ſciences. Extraordinary opinions of the Cabala, and the philoſopher Phoe. That the ſoul diſſolv'd itſelf into heaven after its ſeparation from the body. According to the Cabala, heaven is made of animated matter. Converſation with an old Bramin in Pondichery, who pretended to ſhew ſeveral ſurpriſing things by killing a cock, ibid. The Bramin proves an impoſtor, 249.

Bramins. or Bramines, chief of the Indian caſtes, 300. Opinions of Suidas and Poſtellus, with regard to their origin. Said to be deſcended from Abraham. The Indians deny this. Bramins of two ſorts; viz. thoſe commonly call'd Bramins and Verteas. 82 caſtes of the Bramins. Fam'd for their learning. Prieſts. Have ſome peculiar and whimſical injunctions, ibid. Inſtruct their youth, 301. Diſcipline of their youth. Are waſh'd and receiv'd naked. Bound to a Pythagorean ſilence. Admitted Bramins at fourteen. Things enjoin'd them. The ſpecial kind of Bramins call'd Verteas. Their habits. Never ſhave, but tear off all the hair from their heads. Several caſtes of theſe Bramins. A feſtival call'd Putcheſon. A penſion then given to reſtrain the death of cattle, &c. More ſtrict in many things than the common Bramins. Are forbid marriage. More abſtemious. More cautious of preſerving things animated. Diſperſe their very dung and ordure with a broom, leſt it ſhould generate worms. Keep an hoſpital for lame fowl, ibid. Are a naſty people, 302.

Bramins, preface to the reverend Dr. Rogers's diſſertation on their religion and manners, 311, and 312.

Bramins, their caſts or tribes, 313. Four caſts of Brachmans. That of the Bramins the moſt honourable. Their Vedam (anſwering to our bible) will not allow them to be put to death for any crime whatſoever. Their eyes put out, the higheſt puniſhment. Penance enjoin'd thoſe who kill a Bramin, muſt eat out of his skull, and build a temple, &c. ibid.

Bramins, their employment and maintenance, 319. Educate youth in reading, writing and accompts, and their diſciples in religion. If rich, muſt teach gratis. Poſſeſs a third part of the revenues of the country. Forbid to follow mechanic trades, ibid. The king maintains ſome Bramins by giving them villages. Artifice of the Bramins upon this occaſion, ibid.

Bramins, a curious, but curſory view of their ſtudies, 441. The city of Benares in Bengal is the chief place of their ſtudy. No college or ſchool. The maſters diſpers'd up and down. Number of pupils to each maſter. Their ſtudies, according to Bernier, carried on in an indolent manner. Have great vivacity and penetration, ibid. The Hanſcrit, a learned language, their firſt ſtudy, 442. Their religious books writ in that tongue only. Other particulars concerning it. The ſacred books called Beths, which is the ſame with the Vedam. Then learn the Purance, a kind of abridgment of the Beths. Six ſects ſprung from their ſix moſt celebrated philoſophers. Each poſſeſs'd with a ſpirit of jealouſy and prejudice. Another ſect in Mogul divided into twelve branches. Books in which the tenets of theſe various ſects are contained, treat of the firſt principles of things. Particulars of their ſyſtems. Their books of phyſic, ibid. Their principles of medicine different from ours, 443. Are ignorant of anatomy. Their aſtronomy, and how they calculate eclipſes. The eclipſe of the moon is owing to that planet's being cruelly uſed by an ugly devil. Their opinions concerning the planets. Their geography and chronology barbarous, ibid. Their ridiculous notions of demons and genii. Their notions with regard to phyſicks, 444.

Brammon, the eldeſt ſon of Pourous, 279. Dear to his creator. Honour'd by his brethren. Gave himſelf much to reading. Man produced out of the navel of the world. God commands Brammon to take his book in his hand, ibid. He travels towards the eaſt, 280. Comes to a mountain, a valley near it. A woman ſlaking her thirſt at a ſtream. Brammon and ſhe naked. Deſcription of her perſon. They are both ſtruck dumb at this unexpected meeting. She ſpeaks firſt. Deſires him to ſit down and communicate to her the contents of his book. It prompts them to cohabit together, which they do. Their marriage hail'd by the ſun, the moon, and muſick from heaven. They people the eaſt. The woman's name Savatree, ibid.

Bremaw, one of the three perfect perſons who begins the ſecond age, 288. The almighty deſcends from heaven on a high mountain, and calls Bremaw forth, who is impower'd with the virtue of forming creatures, and made lord of the ſun, moon, clouds, ſhowers, dews, hills, vallies, &c. He is deeply afflicted in body. Pangs like thoſe of child-bearing. A man and woman come from his body. They worſhip god. They travel and people the world, ibid.

Bremaw, 305. The book of religion deliver'd by him. Particulars of it. Mankind degenerate. The lord grows angry. Deſcends on a mountain, and acquaints Bremaw with the wickedneſs of the world. Tells of a judgment to come, which reforms reforms them. They again grow wicked. Bremaw interceeds, but in vain, and the lord takes him up into heaven. Commands Ruddery to send out a wind, which sweeps mankind from off the face of the earth. Description of that dreadful catastrophe, ibid. A few cover'd by Vishney's skirt, escape and people the world again, ibid.

Bruma, his adventures, 368. Sprang originally from his brother's navel. The heathen Indian priests a most proud, and most abominable caste, ibid. The Raiats sprung from Bruma's shoulders, the Comatis from his thighs, the Xutres from his feet. Xutres employ'd in traffic. Bruma at each man's birth writes on his forehead whatever he is to do, &c. Transforms himself into a stag. Pursues his daughter to take her to wife. Marries her. The thirty millions of gods angry. His brother cuts off one of his heads with his long nails. The Bramins pretend to be the god Bruma. The people believe all they enjoin, as so many articles of faith. Bruma marries a very learned woman. Bruma worshipped under the figure of the Lingam, i.e. Priapus, ibid.

Burials of the Americans, 67. The custom of bewailing the dead, founded on a natural principle. To what this custom may possibly be owing. Some nations cut off their hair in token of sorrow, ask the deceased why they left the world? whether he wanted any thing when alive? &c. This custom accounted for. Possibly took its rise from some great person's lamenting a friend or relation, who was immediately imitated by his subalterns, out of meer flattery, ibid. This ceremony being imitated by others, grew up insensibly into a custom, 68. Heighten'd by the superstition natural to man. The Savages of North America bewail their dead, and keep their corps and embalm them. Funeral songs sung by their old women, &c. Obsery'd also by the Romans. Funeral solemnities of the Greeks and Romans. Reflections on the tears shed on these occasions. Whimsical grief of the women of Gascony and Languedoc, ibid. Fine verses of Mr. Pope on this subject, n. ibid. Some American Savages smut their faces with black, in token of grief. The Jews, the heroes of Homer and Virgil mentioned. The North Americans mourn, by going miserably clad, ibid. Women of Florida throw their hair on their husbands corps, 69. Mourning of the Egyptians, Jews, ancient Thracians. Americans bury with their dead all they made use of in their life-time. Burying of greater antiquity than burning. Americans in general bury their dead. Sing in honour of them every time they pass by their graves. Savages of Canada, Mississippi, &c. present gifts to their dead, much the same as several nations of antiquity, ibid. Germans said to bury with their dead whatever they made use of in their life-time, n. ibid.

CABALA, what it is, n. 248.

Calendar of the Mexicans, 145. Regulated by the motion of the sun. Could take its altitude and declination. Intercalary days, during which they devoted themselves to indolence, recreations, &c. Revolution of the Mexican age. Why they compute their years from the south. Look out to see if the world is at an end, ibid. Every 52 years the Mexicans prepare for the geral destruction of nature, 146. Manner of this whimsical Ceremony. The joy with which they celebrate the continuation of the world. From whom they probably borrow'd this idea, ibid.

Calumet, description of it, 72. A very long pipe made of red stones, adorn'd with feathers. Savages also dance the Calumet before they begin any considerable enterprize. A more accurate description of the Calumet 'Tis a passport to all who go to the allies of such nation as send it. The symbol of peace. The seal of all public undertakings, of all important affairs, and public ceremonies, ibid.

Calumet-dance, 92. In a hut in winter-time, in the open air in summer. A great mat spread. The tutelary deity placed on it. The Calumet on its right hand. A trophy of bows, arrows, &c. round the Calumet. The deity saluted. Incens'd with tobacco. All set round on their posteriors. The Calumet is taken up by an old man, who dances. The motions of the Calumet odd and whimsical. A battle, to which they are excited by kettle drums. The man who holds the Calumet, invites some young man to fight him, who accordingly does so. The combat fought in cadence. The conqueror relates his military atchievements to the assembly. A present made him. The Calumet given from hand to hand, ibid.

Captives, how treated among the Americans, 95. A prisoner is bound when he sings the death-song, ibid. Particulars of one of these songs, n. ibid. Warriors return from the inroad, they break into the dead shout, sing the mournful song. A lane made for the captives to pass thro, who are beat with clubs by the youth of 14 or 15 years of age. Prisoners distributed among the people. They may either save the slaves, or fatten them to kill. The death of these captives a kind of sacrifice, ibid. The Irequois fatten, and dress them as fine as possible for this ceremony, 96. Sentence passes upon the captive, and he is tied to the stake, when they burn his body with instruments, and he sings the death-song. He laughs at his executioners. His hair and skin tore off, and left hanging on his shoulders. He is loos'd from the stake, pelted with stones, his flesh cut and mangled, he being still alive. After he is dead, they run up and down with clubs to drive his soul away. Women to whom male-slaves are given, sometimes fall in love with him, when he is restored to his liberty, with great ceremony. The antient Scythians said to have scalp'd their enemies. The Americans never allow an exchange of prisoners, ibid.

Caravan-Serahs in India, description of them, 227.

Castes, or tribes in India, 231. As those of the Jews antiently. The Jewish tribes. The Indian tribes not allow'd to mix. The tribe of the Parias had in the utmost detestation. Particulars of it, ibid. The jesuits and capuchins of Pondichery endeavour to root out these prejudices, 232. These Indians ought to be used with tenderness. Indulgence shewn to heathen converts as assembled in Jerusalem. Another instance of this in the Old Testament, in the person of Naaman, whom Elisha cured of his leprosy. Reflections on them. Prudence and judgment the most essential qualifications in a missionary, ibid. Time may perhaps eradicate these prejudices out of the minds of the Indians. Marriages, which are now look'd upon as incestuous, allowed anciently among the Jews, Greeks, and Egyptians. Shocking marriages among the Persians. Heads of castes or tribes. Their functions both among Jews and Indians. Persons who presided over the ten wards or districts of the city of Athens, ibid. The first founders of monarchs no more than heads of tribes, 234.

Castes, or tribes in India, how to be govern'd, according to the book of the Banians call'd the Shaster, 300. No invention more commodious for the government of the world, than was used by the four tribes in the first age. Exemplified in Brammon's instructing people in religion, Cutter's keeping men in subjection, Shuddery's instructing them in traffic, and Wyse in the mechanical arts, ibid.

Ceremonies, promiſcuous ones of a very odd nature, 164, 165.
Children, American, their birth, 19. The Cimbri uſed to plunge their new-born infants in ſnow. The Braſilian husbands ſerve as midwives. Waſh the child, and paint it red and black. No ſwadling-clothes. The child laid in a hammock. The mother, immediately after ſhe's brought to bed, gets up, and falls to work. Livonian women, among the peaſants, do the ſame. The Europeans not robuſt, becauſe of the effeminacy they have inherited from their foreſathers. Children of poor people ſtrong; thoſe of the rich, weak. Americans who act the part of the lying-in women. The Tibarenians and antient Spaniards had alſo this cuſtom, ibid. Locke's Education quoted on this head. Significant anſwer of a Scythian philoſopher to an Athenian, n. ib. Ridiculouſneſs of this cuſtom, 20. One advantage may reſult from it. American women, as ſoon as they have conceived, break off all correſpondence with their husbands. A very good cuſtom, ibid. American women nurſe their own children, 21. A whimſical cuſtom of ſome of theſe nations; children laid in a kind of trough. South Americans lay the children on the ground, or in a hammock, ibid. Locke quoted on the dreſs that is fit for children, n. ibid. Children of Savages not deform'd, 22. Americans love their children more than the Europeans. Greeks expoſed theirs, and the Romans ſold their children. Livonian peaſants ſaid to do the ſame. Their reaſons for it. Americans fond of having a numerous offspring. The great ſtruggle betwixt nature and honour in the caſe of illegitimate children. Cruelty of thoſe parents who deſtroy theſe. The Americans never ſo barbarous. Grandeur or intereſt no ſway among theſe. No diſparity in marriage among them. Conſider children as ſo many helps. The Americans here follow nature more than we do, ibid. A reflection on the cuſtom of making fine ſhapes by ſtrait clothes, &c. from Locke, n. ibid. American children taught to uſe the bow or club as ſoon as they can walk, 23. Seldom troubled with diſeaſes. Great advantage of exerciſe. That large bodies of lame and crooked people might be raiſed in Europe. Gymnaſtic exerciſes of the Greeks. The Pyrrhic dance. Exerciſes of the Romans and antient Germans. Americans ſeldom cultivate the minds of their children. Ignorant of the ſciences. They boaſt moſt of the natural duties. Some people about the ſtreights of Magellan, almoſt brutes, ibid. Mr. Locke's reflections on the bracing and binding of the Chineſe women's feet, n. ibid. That the Mexicans committed their children to the care of their prieſts, 24. Children of the Americans how named from their fathers. Braſilians name their children at random. Peruvians ſometimes give names which recall ſome memorable event, ibid.
Children of the Bramins, ceremonies after their birth, 320. Birth, not doctrine, conſtitutes the Bramins. Unclean till the tenth day. Not a Bramin till he receives the Dſandhem, a kind of little ſhoulder-belt. Obliged to light the fire Homan, ibid. A kind of canopy raiſed over it by ſpreading their clothes, 321. Particulars of that ceremony. Precepts enjoin'd the young Bramins. Muſt have no commerce with women, and eat but one meal a day. A perſon that has once received the Dſandhem, obliged to wear it all his life-time. What the young Bramins learn, &c. ibid.
Children of the Mexicans, their birth, 149. Carried to the temple. Some drops of blood taken from its ears and privy parts. A circumciſion and ſort of immerſion. The child devoted in the temple. Parents ſuperintended their education. Very ſtrict. Their food judiciouſly regulated. Check'd idleneſs. Manner of their chaſtiſement. Rebellious children puniſhed ſeverely. Inſtruments of puniſhment according to the age, ibid. Drunkenneſs puniſhed with death, 150. Their exerciſes in ſchools. Public ones for the children of the nobility, and thoſe of the plebeians. The maſters had prodigious reſpect ſhewn them. Taught them firſt to read their characters and figures. Another ſchool for modeſty, ſobriety, &c. School for bodily exerciſes. Obliged to ſuffer hunger, thirſt, the inclemencies of the weather, &c. Colleges for young ladies. Governed by matrons. Taught works, and kept under a very ſtrict confinement. Probation of ſuch youths as were deſigned for war, ibid. Employ'd as porters to carry the baggage, 151. Such novices as turned pale at the ſight of an enemy, rejected. Their education equal to that of the Europeans, or of the Greeks and Romans. Very negligent in ours, both with regard to the mind and body. The plays and ſports of the Mexican youths intermixed with religion. The toſſing of a ball the principal diverſion, ibid.
Children of the Peruvians, 188. Extraordinary feaſting at the weaning of the Incas's children, ibid. The child named. Ceremony thereof. The child's hair cut, and offerings made to it. They drink very hard, otherwiſe 'twould be no feſtival, ibid. Their children in general not brought up too tenderly, 189. Waſh'd with cold water the moment they are born, to inure them to hardſhips. Kept in a kind of cradle. Never took them in their arms. Swathed them with old clouts. Odd way of giving them ſuck. Never but three times a day, to prevent their being gluttons. The greateſt ladies nurſed their own children. Their bodies ſtrengthned by exerciſe. Their minds cultivated very young. Taught to abhor idleneſs and luxury, ibid.
Circumciſion, 201. Not practiſed by the Eaſt-Indians. By the Savages of Guinea, ibid. A natural expedient to facilitate procreation, 202. A token of the alliance which God had made between Abraham and his poſterity. The angel would have kill'd Moſes's ſon becauſe he was uncircumciſed. That the Midianites did not uſe it. The Jews, by the word uncircumciſed, ſeem to have underſtood all other nations. That ſome would not be able to propagate without it. Herodotus tells, 'twas practiſed by the inhabitants of Colchos, Egypt, and Ethiopia, ibid. The Troglodites uſed it, according to Diodorus Siculus, 203. That Thales the philoſopher got himſelf circumciſed to ingratiate himſelf with the Egyptians. Three reaſons which could induce men to practiſe circumciſion. 1*ſt*, In obedience to the religion they profeſs'd. 2*dly*, The impoſſibility of getting children without it. 3*dly*, The example of thoſe among whom they reſided. Reaſons why the Egyptians could not be induced from the firſt motive. Why they borrowed circumciſion from the Jews. The Egyptians have, in all ages, been ſuperſtitious. Dreadful cataſtrophes have happen'd among them, ibid. The Egyptians muſt be ſtruck by the great prodigies which were wrought by Moſes, 204. The antient heathens rank'd in the number of their deities, all ſuch of other nations as they thought powerful. Probable, that the Egyptians did not uſe circumciſion before the children of Iſrael left their country. The miracles which Moſes wrought among the former, gave them the higheſt idea of his perſon and religion. Objections to the arguments above-mentioned, ibid. Herodotus makes no mention of the time when the Egyptians firſt uſed circumciſion, 205. A ſecond objection. Anſwer'd. Probably the Troglodites borrow'd it from the Egyptians. The Negroes of Guinea uſe the Mahometan circumciſion. They follow the religion of Mahomet, but imperfectly. That the Negroes did not practiſe circumciſion before Mahomet's Mahomet's time. Several Ethiopians profeſs'd publickly the Jewiſh doctrine. The eunuch of Candace queen of Ethiopia. They uſed to go and worſhip in Jeruſalem. Had a moſt exalted idea of the Jewiſh religion, ibid. Herodotus known to relate falſhoods ſometimes, 206. To affirm that the Negroes of Guinea are obliged to circumciſe, a miſtake. Reflections on this. The Jews falſely ſuppoſed to be obliged to make uſe of it. Circumciſion, a type of what. To point out how mankind ought to behave according to their hearts, ibid. Some object, that circumciſion was only a means of facilitating procreation, 207. Philo quoted on this occaſion. Several natural reaſons of circumciſion. Thoſe who practiſe it, don't procreate more than the uncircumciſed. That the contrary happens, ibid.

Commerce between the two ſexes in America, 40. The moſt brutiſh nations ſoftned by love. The principle of this paſſion the ſame among Savages as us. The difference only in the manner of revealing it. The whimſical manner of a Canadan's diſcloſing his paſſion, as rational as that of many of our European gallants. The Europeans and Americans equally ridiculous in this article. An old Iroquois addreſſes a young Savage as gracefully, as a ſuperannuated European lover his blooming miſtreſs. Nature is alwas the painter on theſe occaſions. The way of making love among the Americans, very ſimple and unrefined, ibid. Their women not ſo cruel as our European ladies, 41. The Savages look upon a young maiden, as a free uncultivated piece of ground, that ought to be the property of the firſt comer. In ſome parts of Peru, the greateſt proſtitutes get husbands ſooneſt. How a Savage makes his addreſſes. Muſt ask her father's conſent, and be able to maintain her. They have not ſtifled all the tender emotions of nature; nor, like us, ſurrounded with objects which make us deviate from virtue; nor have thoſe conflicts between reaſon and the paſſions, ibid. Curtezans in China, whoſe age, price, &c. are writ over their doors, and alſo in Rome, n. ibid. Reflections on the pernicious cuſtoms introduced from time to time among us, 42. Verſes from Moliere's Miſantrope, againſt ſuch as are too rigidly virtuous. Conſiderations on the reſtraint which is put on the fair-ſex, who are not allow'd to break their paſſion firſt, ibid. Verſes on the love of ſcandal, from Dryden. On great ſouls, from Pope's Eſſay on Criticiſm, n. ibid. Tender lines on the happineſs of beaſts in love, and the unhappineſs of women, from Paſtor Fido, 43. The Savages more humane in love than we. Their families maintain'd at a ſmall expence. Their arrows always procure them ſubſiſtence. Canadan courtſhip laſts ſix months. The lover paints his face, &c. The Braſilians ſtrike up at once. The Americans proſtitute their women, ibid. The inhabitants of Ceilan proſtitute their wives and daughters to gueſts. As alſo the Iceland maids. Thracians admitted of the gallantry of their virgins, n. ibid. In ſome countries, the lord lies with his vaſſal's wife on the bridal night, 44. A gay reflection on this cuſtom. The Turks have a quite different notion of it. A plurality of husbands in the Eaſt-Indies, ibid. On men who are perſuaded they have cropt their wives virgin flower, and are miſtaken; from Brantome, n. ibid. Husbands that lend out their wives to their friends. Women purchaſed by way of taſting. Satyr againſt old women who marry, ibid. Gay ſaying of an old woman, from Brantome, n. 45. That many of theſe antiquated creatures ſend their young husbands packing into the other world, ibid. Canadan women marry but once, 45. Whether polygamy is not as lawful, as a husband keeping miſtreſſes? The American women chaſter than ours. Reaſons for it. Arguments againſt it. The Floridians love in a ſhocking manner. Moſt Americans don't marry in the degrees of conſanguinity, ibid. No ſuch thing as portions. Solon's inſtitution on this head. Motives of it. The Savages oblige their wives to be true to their bed. Their wives very faithful. Were it not for honour, our girls would be wanton. Americans jealouſy differs vaſtly from that of the Europeans. The men don't make uſe of our arts. Brantome's rule when a wife loves at random, ibid. Prior's rule for keeping a wife virtuous, n. ibid. Unjuſt to put a woman who violates the marriage-bed to death, 47. Frenchmen always revenge themſelves by paying their wives in coin. The Italians act very differently. Verſes on that ſubject. Condition of the American wives, no better than that of our ſervants. Ridiculous for eunuchs to guard women. Severity of ſome European husbands to their wives. Deſpiſed by men of honour, ibid. Old women conſider'd by ſome as lumber, 48. Few coquettes in America, ibid.

Conformity of the heathen doctrine to that of the Chriſtians, 391. Indians formerly acquainted with our myſteries. Since adulterated, ibid. The trinity ſhadow'd under the three perſons Bruma, Vixnu, and Rutrem. All things viſible and inviſible made by the former. Tranſmigration ſubſtituted for the reſurrection. Original ſin. Cleanſed from ſin by waſhing in rivers. Sacrifices to their gods of ſeveral ſorts. Their roſaſaries or chaplets of beads deſcribed, ibid. Their prodigious virtues, 393. Thoſe who wear a peculiar ſort of theſe, may commit any ſin with impunity, ibid. Indians have ſome notion of the fall of Lucifer, &c. 394. Their account of it. Their whimſical deſcription of the deluge. A groteſque relation of the battles between David and Sampſon. Great veneration the Indians have for theſe fables. Intereſt the ſpring which ſets their prieſts at work, and makes them publiſh ſo many fictions. Groteſque ſtory of Ram, ibid. & ſeq.

Conſecration of the ground on which the pagods in India are built, &c. 436.

Coronation of their monarchs, 146. Elected by the people, but the whole managed by the nobles. The elected monarch obliged to make a campaign; after which he is inaugurated with great pomp, ibid. A ſpeech made to the king upon the regal office, 147. The high-prieſt anoints him. Puts a whimſical cowl over him. His coronation-oath. That the ſun ſhall give its light, &c. A very whimſical contract, ibid.

Councils of the Savages of Canada and Miſſiſippi, 91. Compoſed of the old men of the nation. Proclaimed by a cryer. The ſpeaker harangues in the midſt of the young men, ibid.

Creation, by Brahma, 337. Whimſical account of it. The leaf of a tree in the ſhape of a child playing with its toe in its mouth, floating on the water; a flower iſſues from its navel, whence Brahma drew his original. Brahma had at firſt five heads. The middle one ſplit. He is very proud, ibid. Brahma created the world, and preſides over it with ſovereign ſway, 338. Has ſeveral ſubalterns. Devendre the chief. The eight worlds, and their ſituation, ibid.

Creation, according to the Bramins, 277. God being alone, reſolves to create the world. Conſults with himſelf about it. Creates four elements, which at firſt were mix'd together. Separates 'em with a great cane, which he blew on the waters, and makes the firmament, ibid. Forms the earth and ſea into a ball, and with a humming ſound places 'em in the midſt of the firmament, 278. Sun and moon created. The elements being diſpos'd, fulfil their ſeveral parts. The Lord conveys a ſeminal virtue to 'em. The world meaſured by four cardinal points of the compaſs. Man created by God's command, and comes from the bowels of the earth. Deſcription tion of its birth. How 'tis animated with life. His colour begins to glow; his eyes to disclose themselves. Woman created call'd Parcoutee, and the man's name Pourous. They cohabit as man and wife. Have four sons, Brammon, Cuttery, Shuddery, and Wyse. Their tempers varied according to the different elements. Brammon melancholy and ingenious, and therefore ordain'd by God for knowledge. Cuttery of a martial spirit; appointed to govern kingdoms, ibid. Shuddery of a milder nature, made a merchant, 279. Wyse subtile and ingenious. These peopled the world. God creates four women for these four men, and places 'em at the four winds, that their progeny might spread the better, ibid.

Cuttery, the second son of Pourous, 280. The almighty consigns him to the west. Goes out with his sword in his hand, ibid. Repines, because he cannot meet with any thing to encounter, 281. His fiery temper. Comes to a high mountain, and meets with a goodly personage. Proves to be a woman. Her person describ'd. Is very couragious. Description of the instrument she held in her hand. Her name Teddicastree. They fight. Give several wounds. Desist from, and renew the fight. Night comes on, and neither are victorious. They fight the next day. Cuttery breaks her instrument. She changes it into a bow. The second day ends. They fight the third day; he with his sword, she with her bow and arrows, ibid. The woman gains the advantage, 282. The close. The victory still equal. He addresses her in an amorous way. His arguments why they should not fight. She yields to them, and they become amorous friends. From them descended a warlike generation, which peopled the west, ibid.

Cutterys, the second caste in India, 302. All kings and soldiers of this tribe. Consider'd in their flourishing, their declining and present state. In their flourishing state, were kings and rulers of India, and called Rajahs. These had four men chiefly about their persons. First, soothsayers. 2*dly*, politicians. 3*dly*, companions for conversation. 4*thly*, generals. Rajahs divided into 36 tribes In their declining state. Rannedeuill, a virtuous woman, propheſies their downfal. A Rajah dies, and his son builds a noble monument to his memory. Enquires of the soothsayers, whether it should exist long, or be ruin'd, and by whom. A king nam'd that should destroy it, ibid. Sends to bribe him, 303. He is not found, but one Alaudin, who was a woodman. The messenger goes to him, and tells him his errand. Makes great promises, and begs him to spare the monument. The woodman refuses the treasure offer'd him, and answers, that he must fulfil the dictates of providence. His parents advise him to accept of it, and accordingly he does so. A quirk of his upon that occasion. Alaudin raises soldiers, becomes king of Delee, and overthrows many Rajahs. Leaves the conduct of his wars to Tuttercon his cup-bearer, whom he makes king of Guzzarat. Their present state. Some of the Rajahs yielded; others fled to retirements, and made inroads, ibid. Names of Rajahs unconquer'd to this day, ibid.

Customs of the heathens, of great use in illustrating several passages in the sacred writings, &c. 196.

DANCES of the Americans, 91. Of several kinds. That of the Calumet, the leader's dance, the war, the marriage, and the sacrifice dance. That of the Calumet the finest to receive ambassadors or foreigners. How they meet and dance round the officer, who bears the Calumet half an hour, ibid.

Days, lucky and unlucky, of the Bramins, 324. Very superstitious on this head, ibid.

Debauches among the antients, 198. Famous debauch at the death of Calenus. Great quantity. N. Torquatus drunk.

Deity, in what places worshipped by the East-Indians, 213. Men made choice of gloomy places, and shades made by lofty trees, to pay their devotions to the deity. The Jews worship false gods in groves. The pious sacrifice to God upon hills. An altar erected in opposition to the express prohibition of the law. Reasons given for it, ibid. The Jews expressly forbid to sacrifice victims any where but in the temple, 214. Indian idols dispersed up and down the fields, and lodg'd in little tufted woods. Jews erected trees for the service of travellers. The heathen pagods dark and low. The Jews thought God delighted in gloomy places, thick clouds, &c. Most nations of antiquity had the same opinion, ibid. Physical reasons why people chose gloomy places for worshipping the deity, 215. Darkness raises a veneration for the deity, ibid.

Devandiren, king of the gods, 381. Is cloy'd with the sweets of heaven, and comes upon earth; goes to a solitude inhabited by a penitent, Gaudamen by name, who had a most lovely wife; is distractedly fond of her, and endeavours to make her violate her husband's bed, which she refusing to do, the god has recourse to artifice. The penitent using to rise at cock-crowing, to go and wash in the Ganges, Devandiren assumes the figure of a cock, and crowing much earlier than the house-cock used to do, the penitent rises, goes to the river, and finding 'twas but midnight, returns back, and sees the god in bed with his wife. Exasperated, he curses Devandiren, ibid. Wishes certain infamous marks may appear upon this god's body, which accordingly happen'd, 382. The god beseeches the penitent to mitigate the severity of his curses. The penitent was touch'd, and the god's body was from that time cover'd over with eyes like a second Argus. Gaudamen's wife was changed into a stone; but Vixnu treading upon it, she was re-metamorphosed to the same beautiful creature, and lived afterwards in unity with her husband, ibid.

Devetas, 344. Happy and beneficent intelligencers. The sun, moon, and stars are Devetas. Others, ibid.

Diet of the Americans, 49. Not luxurious or delicate in it. Unacquainted with the use of bread. Of what they made their cakes. Made biscuits when they went a hunting. Some eat maiz. Food of the antient Romans, ibid. Illustrious example of Roman probity and frugality, in the person of Caius Fabricius, n. ibid. North Americans had no salt, 50. Antients esteem'd it much. American Savages broil their victuals, or dry it in the sun. Drink water, but invented strong liquors. The Caouin of the Brasilians, a spirit drawn from maiz. They drink to great excess, and would knock down our European Bacchanals. Use to drink out of prodigious large goblets. Their women quaff heartily, ibid. Verses from Addison's Cato on the great abstemiousness of the Romans. Verses on the good effects produced by wine. Water extremely wholesome, n. ibid. English, French, and Dutch women drink, 51. Women apt to indulge in their cups, beyond the rules of decorum. The life which wine gives to love. The Savages eat in a slovenly manner, without knives, forks, table-cloths, &c. How the Savages of North America entertain their guests; wait upon 'em, and sing all the time, ibid. Before table-cloths were invented, the Dutch had a blue rag that used to go round the table, 52. The French cooks have refined our eating. Savages have religious banquets; are heighten'd with songs. Possibly the religious festivals of the ancients had not much religion in 'em. The Germans use very long graces graces at meals. The Canadan women don't eat with the men. The French don't value an entertainment, unleſs it be heighten'd by women. The antient Romans not very polite to the ladies, ibid. Fine ſatyr of the famous Lewis Cornaro againſt luxury, n. ibid. French women accuſed by Monſ. Muralt of giving themſelves maſculine airs, ibid. The Dutch parties of pleaſure with their women, very ridiculous, 57. The men and women in different rooms. The Savages withdraw from their women out of contempt. The Dutch know nothing but to caſt up an account, and to look after their ſhops. Their young women too much confin'd from the other ſex, and therefore ſooner impos'd upon by 'em. The Savages vaſtly humane to one another, ibid. Obſerve the laws of hoſpitality, 54. The Gauls, French, antient and modern Germans, very hoſpitable. All debates of the Savages open'd with a pipe. When tobacco was firſt brought into Europe, ibid.

Diſeaſes of the Americans, and their methods of cure, 54. Often by violent exerciſes. Some reflections on the great advantages of it. Of more uſe than the preſcriptions of the ableſt phyſicians, ibid. Verſes from Dryden on this head, n. ibid. The Floridians uſe Vomits, and lance the parts troubled with the rheumatiſm, ibid. Good effects of friction, 55. Braſilians preſcribe a long courſe of abſtinence to their patients. The Peruvians employ'd ſimples, natural and artificial fires to cure their ſick. A ſingle atom may be the cauſe of incurable evils. The mechaniſm of the human body wonderful. Life and death are contiguous. Our ſtate of miſery conſider'd. Man does not owe his health and ſtrength to phyſic, but a freedom from cares. Savages of North America live 140 or 160 years. Des Cartes on the paſſions of the ſoul quoted, n. ibid. Character of Lewis Cornaro's ſobriety, from Monſ. de Thou, ibid. Inhabitants of cities don't live to ſo advanced an age as thoſe who live in the country, 56. Prieſts often uſe inchantments to heal their ſick. Anſchniſts, who pretend to cure wounds by mumbling a few words. Numberleſs ſuperſtitious practices employ'd in healing diſeaſes. The Savages are patient to a miracle; lay burning coals on their arms to heal their diſtempers. Penances and auſterities among the Mexicans, Peruvians, Virginians, &c. The antient Lacedemonians uſed to try the patience of their children before the altar of Diana, ibid. The Spaniſh cruelty and barbarity condemn'd, n. ibid.

Divorces common in Mexico, 148. Little ceremony of it. Muſt not cohabit together again upon pain of death, &c. ibid. An adulterer puniſh'd with death, 149.

Dreſs of the Americans, 26. A paſſage from Milton's Paradiſe Loſt, n. ibid. Some American nations go naked, 27. Cuſtom makes us wear clothes. Children not aſham'd to go naked, till taught otherwiſe. An Objection; why then do the Savages cover the pudenda? Anſwer'd, that their anceſtors probably had heard of the diſobedience of the firſt man. Picts went naked, till frequented by the Romans. Naſtineſs of the Hottentots. The cuſtom of wearing clothes not the effect of religion. A man may go naked, and be very devout. Uſe would ſoon reconcile it. Some Americans ſhut the pudenda up in a caſe; ſome of theſe adorn'd with gold and pearls. Some American nations wear a skin over their ſhoulders, which is the primitive dreſs, ibid. A paſſage from Milton to this purpoſe, n. ibid. Others adorn'd with tufts of feathers, 28. Savages who wear a kind of mat, and a ſort of ſtockings. Go generally bare-headed, and their hair falling on their ſhoulders. Some burn their hair off with ſtones made red-hot. Others burn it quite cloſe to their ears. Others again rub their hair with oil, and ſtick it full of feathers. Cuſtom of wearing long hair natural. Cuſtom of the French on this occaſion. The Chineſe fancied they'd be carried up to heaven by the hair of the head. Antients often went bare-headed. A fine paſſage from Milton's Paradiſe Loſt on the native beauty of our firſt parents, n. ibid. Mr. Locke would that children of a year or two old ſhould never have their heads cover'd, it preſerving from colds, catarrhs, n. 29. Why the Engliſh butt ſo ſtoutly with their heads, ibid. Conformity of the Americans, and ſome other nations, with reſpect to the adorning the head, ibid.

E.

EASTERN princes, 200. Reflections on their chuſing either to reign or die. On the bloody adminiſtration of ſome princes; and the ficklenes and diſaffection of ſubjects, 201. The little real affection the Eaſterns bear to their monarchs, owing to the pride and cruelty of the latter. The Eaſterns in general effeminate, and leſs capable of real and ſolid virtue than the Europeans. Sometimes kings forced to be cruel, ibid.

Eclipſes, how form'd, according to the Eaſt-Indians, 388. A feaſt of the gods. The adder Sexon invited, who coming late, ſome butter was ſet by for him. The ſun and moon eat it up. The adder comes in, is angry, and ſwallows 'em; but ſoon throws 'em up again. 'Tis on theſe occaſions eclipſes are form'd, ibid. Further particulars thereof, 389.

Edifices, public ones in India, 227. Pagods, &c. generally built of great, black ſtones. Deſcription of them. No wood uſed in thoſe buildings. Solomon's houſe, ibid. Houſes of the Indians, in what taſte, 228. Viſits. A very rude compliment to ask a man how his wife does, ibid.

Employments of the American women, 59. Wholly domeſtic. Never come to councils, nor allow'd to eat with men; but this not from jealouſy, but from their contempt of the fair-ſex. The Gauls and antient Germans admitted their wives to their entertainments and councils, and all parties of pleaſure. Some reflections on antient chivalry, when ladies were fought for. Our gallantry leſs affected, and more fickle than that of our anceſtors. The Savages more uniform than we, ib.

Eſſences of the Eaſt-Indians, 261. Fond of flowers and eſſences. Sprinkle one with roſe-water in their viſits. Vide the notes [a], [b], [c], for whimſical reflections on Hungary-water, &c. The powder of ſandal, a very fragrant wood. They powder themſelves with it. Their women employ themſelves in making noſegays, garlands, and chaplets of flowers, ibid.

Events, how the Americans tranſmitted memorable ones to poſterity, 70. Some pretend they were ignorant of the art of writing. Others, that they made books with leaves of trees, and writ in them. Deſtructive zeal of the Spaniſh monks and prieſts condemn'd all their precious monuments to the flames. Their books conſiſted of hieroglyphicks and paintings, under which hiſtorical events and the phænomena of nature were repreſented. In what manner the Spaniards pointed out the year emblematically. When the Spaniards entred Mexico, the Peruvians had neither letters or characters after the manner of the Chineſe, or figures as the Arabians. Had ſome notion of painting, but rude and artleſs. Oral tradition, and the Quappus, or Quippos, their only regiſters. Quippos were ſtrings made of cotton or guts. The Peruvians threw little ſtones into the ſhape of a wheel, in order to learn any thing by heart; and by theſe they were afterwards taught the principles of religion. The order in which the Mexican hieroglyphicks were rang'd, ibid.

Excommunicated among the Indians, 254. Call'd loſing the caſte. Look'd upon as infamous wretches, wretches, and univerſally ſhunn'd. Break to pieces all the veſſels they may have made uſe of. Subjects of excommunication, drinking wine, feeding on cows fleſh, &c. All the heathens of antiquity had their excommunicated perſons. Words pronounced againſt them, ibid.

Exerciſes of the Americans, 56. Dancing of great antiquity. Probably, in the infancy of the world, when mankind were unprey'd upon by cares. Hebrews dance to the glory of the creator, and heathens to their Idols. The Eaſt-Indians and Americans made dancing a part of their religious worſhip. Floridian, Canadan, Virginian, Mexican, Peruvian, &c. dances. Theſe look upon it as a very healthy exerciſe. Socrates lov'd dancing. Motive of our learning it, different from that of the antients. The Americans dance to pleaſe their gueſts, &c. Are more nimble than we. Deſcription of their dances. Very whimſical, ibid. Mr. Coxley's notion of dancing. Character of Cleomira's dancing, from the Spectator, n. ibid. The Americans always dance in their publick debates, and other moſt ſerious affairs, 37. Their ſinging, to what uſe applied. Tho' rude and inelegant, are yet adorn'd with figures, and a kind of poetic enthuſiaſm. Apology for the Savages on this occaſion. The wild flights of poets cenſur'd, ibid. The vaſt uſe of poetry in pleaſing and inſtructing the mind, n. ibid. The Americans ſaid to be acquainted with poetry, and compoſe ſongs in honour of their gods and heroes. Have thereby preſerved very memorable events. Orpheus, Linus and Muſeus, were probably poets, prophets, and hiſtorians. No wonder that the firſt ages were over-run with fiction, which robb'd us of the knowledge of our anceſtors. The antient Europeans everlaſting ſongſters, ibid. Verſe of great help to memory, 38. Charlemain commanded ballads to be compos'd, the ſubjects whereof were the gallant actions of their anceſtors, for the uſe of children. Americans follow war, hunting, and fiſhing. Canoos, of what made. Moſes's ark a kind of canoo. Uſed by the Engliſh, Scotch, and Saxons. Canoos ſuppos'd to give riſe to the fable of the Syrens, ibid.

Exercifes daily of the Bramins, 327. Oblig'd to wake two hours before day-break. They eaſe nature, waſh their hands, face, and feet. Sing a ſtory, &c. Silk clothes are naturally pure. Being dreſs'd, ſeveral ceremonies made with water. Pour ſome thrice into the hollow of their hands. Whimſical reaſon of this cuſtom, ibid. A kind of roſary made uſe of, 328. The idol worſhipp'd, in which is the almighty's coat of arms. The idol dreſs'd in flowers, &c. Another little idol of copper. Tapers lighted up before it. Anoint their foreheads with a gum. Tiertum, a holy water. Waſh themſelves with it when they have been polluted. The ceremony of the 24 names of God. Their Poranes, or antient chronicles, ibid. & 329.

Exterior, affected of the Indians, 263. Are a neat people. Bathe very often. Have a great command over their anger. Conceal their reſentments very artfully, ibid. Patient when overreach'd, 264.

F.

FAKIRS, a kind of fryars in India, 240. They out-do the antient Anchorets in penance and mortification. Some make a vow of continuing always in one poſture. Others ſtand for ever with their arms on high. Others mangle their bodies with ſcourges and knives. Go ſtark naked. The Adamites uſed to aſſemble naked, pray, &c. Indecencies they were ſaid to act on thoſe occaſions. The common people have the higheſt idea of the Fakirs, ibid. Are accuſed of committing enormous crimes in private, 241. The ſtrange manner in which the prieſts of Baal honour'd their gods. Some Fakirs make a vow of rolling themſelves a certain number of leagues over ſtones, briars, &c. A rambling kind of Fakirs, who go in crouds like gypſies. They tell fortunes. Dangerous to meet them alone. The Indians have theſe in the higheſt veneration. Fakirs compar'd to the ſons of the prophets, ibid. The voluntary caſtration of the prieſts of Atys and Cybele, and other ceremonies among the Greeks and Romans compar'd to thoſe of the Fakirs. Alſo the monks of La Trape, n. ibid. Eliſha demands a minſtrel before he conſults the Lord. Reflections on this ceremony, 241, 242. The Fakirs employ'd drums, trumpets, &c. to rouze their ſouls, and rais'd themſelves to extaſy, when they pronounced their prophecies, ibid. Enquiry into the power which muſic may have over the religious ſoul, n. ibid. The Jews generally call'd the prophets frantic, ibid. The heathens gave the name of fury to the enthuſiaſm of their prophets; and the poets thereby expreſs'd enthuſiaſm and inſpiration, n. ibid. The antients thought that a man muſt be frantic, in order to his being fill'd with the ſpirit of God, ibid. Ignorant people always ſeek for the marvellous, 243. Some of the antients were far from being ſuperſtitious. The ſharp invectives of the poet Ennius againſt the pretended prophets of his time, ibid.

Feaſts, faſts, &c. in India, 439, & ſeq.

Feſtival of the ſun in Cuſco, 178. The chief captains and caciques aſſiſted at it. The Incas open'd the feſtival. All the nobility go in proceſſion. Swell'd with pride, ibid. The egg-ſhell with which all the worlds are ſurrounded, 360. The egg-ſhell crack'd. A white horſe offer'd in ſacrifice. A difficult one. The horſe ſent up and down the country, with a writing fix'd on its tail. Eſcorted by a great number of women, and 60,000 young men. The horſe ſtole away, and hid under the ſeventh world. A fluttering devil gives notice where he was. They eat the earth down to the center, and come at the horſe, ibid. A young man leaps upon him, 361. Eſxara takes the Ganges upon his head. A holy man ſwallows the river up, which afterwards iſſues out of his thigh. The aſhes of 60,000 perſons being water'd with it, they come to life again. The Ganges call'd the celeſtial river, the river of the thigh and Bagireti. Reaſons why they were ſo call'd, ibid.

Gardens, in India, how laid out and water'd, 235. A confus'd medley of trees, without order or ſymmetry; but very pleaſant. Preferable to parterres in hot countries. Every garden has generally a well or pond in it. A baſon hard-by this; which being fill'd with that water, and a hole at the bottom, it diſtributes the water up and down the whole garden. A more convenient way than watering 'em with pots, ibid.

Garrouda, the bird, its origin, 341. Strange ſtory of Caſſiopa's (one of the firſt Brannins) two wives, and a horſe, about which a wager was laid. Diti conceives, and lays two eggs. A child iſſues from one, which was broke, ibid. The immature babe is angry, flies up into the air, and undertakes to guide the ſun's chariot, 342. Garrouda iſſues out of the other egg. Fetches the Amortam (a liquor) to reſcue his mother out of ſlavery. How the tongues of ſerpents firſt became forked. Viſtnou made choice of Garrouda to carry him as the eagle does Jupiter, ibid.

Gasjendre Motsjam, his ſtory, according to the Bramins. Sung always at day-break, 329. A high mountain in one of the ſeven ſeas of milk. Has three ſummits of gold, ſilver, and iron. A Deveta diverts himſelf with his wife in it, but neglects paying honour to a holy being, who, offended at it, threatens that the Deveta ſhould be turn'd into an elephant. The Deveta begs pardon, but in vain. Is metamorphoſed into that beaſt. Going to drink at a pond, he engages a crocodile, and the battle continues a thouſand years. The elephant defeated, and returns to his natural ſhape. Is reſtor'd to his former ſtate by Viſtnou, ibid.

General, very whimſical manner of electing one, 164.

God, according to the Banians, 277.

God, according to the Bramins, 337. But one God, ibid.

H.

HELL, according to the Indians, 383. Its ſituation. The preſident of hell. His ſecretary, who writes down the actions of all men. The preſident very juſt. Manner of the tryals. Man may be puniſhed firſt, and rewarded afterwards, or rewarded firſt and puniſhed afterwards; after which he returns back upon earth. Puniſhment of the damn'd in hell, ibid. How to obtain a quick paſſage over the burning river, 384. A ſecond preſident of hell, call'd Yhamen. Story of his dying, and riſing again. A penitent deſires the god would let a child be born to him. He grants it, and leaves him to his option; who makes choice of a child that ſhould be virtuous, but die in his ſixteenth year. The child is born; grows up, and is very pious. Being ſixteen years old, Death ſends for him. The youth refuſes to die; whereupon Yhamen, the king of death, comes riding upon a buffle, and ſummons him to die. The youth refuſes. Yhamen throws a rope about his neck, and was going to drag him into hell, when the god Xiven, or Rutrem, delivers him, and kills the king of death, ibid. Ill conſequences which attended it by mankind's multiplying ſo much, 385. Xiven reſtores Yhamen to life, who diſpatches a herald to the earth, with orders for mankind to ſubmit immediately to him. The herald gets drunk, mounts an elephant, and does not publiſh the order in the direct terms he had received it. Conſequences of it. Farther particulars of hell, ibid.

Heraldry, if it may be ſo call'd, and hieroglyphicks of the Savages, 98. Trees ſtript of the bark, and ſeveral groteſque emblematical images painted on 'em, at their return from a victory. Their hieroglyphicks, ibid.

Hieroglyphicks of the Mexicans, 144. Paintings on callico, ibid. Numbers or ſigns added to them, 145. A very artful invention. Thereby preſerv'd all memorable incidents. The exploits of their heroes ſung in their temples, ibid.

Hieroglyphicks of the Virginians, 110. Expreſs incidents by the figures of birds, beaſts, &c. Paint themſelves to be diſtinguiſh'd from other nations in war, &c. ibid. An idol is carry'd along with 'em, 111.

Holy-water of the Indians, 217. Jews had theirs, ibid. Indian holy-water is only cow's piſs, 218. That the luſtration with it will draw down the peculiar protection of the gods, and drive away every evil. Reaſons why the Indians pay ſo great veneration to cows. That they are the beſt, and moſt perfect of all beaſts. The tranſmigration of Phoe. The Egyptians worſhipp'd the ox. An emblem of fruitfulneſs. Colour of this beaſt. Pronounced oracles. Good and bad omens at conſulting. Troglodites uſed to ſtrangle with an ox's tail all ſuch as were paſt their labour, ibid. Thought this was doing them a moſt ſingular honour, 219. The great ſervice the ox does to man, may poſſibly be the reaſon of the great veneration paid him. Particulars of the things in which he is ſerviceable. This beaſt firſt taken great care of, becauſe of his uſe to man, and afterwards worſhipp'd, ibid. Statue of an ox on the frontiers of Bengal. To what uſes applied, n. ibid. Indians ſet a little cow of wood or ſtone on a pillar in ſeveral places, ibid. An ox's head fill'd with Arabic characters thought to be a Taliſman, 220. The brazen ſerpent of the Jews in the wilderneſs, perhaps a Taliſman; as alſo the Palladium of the Trojans, ibid.

Hunting, ceremonies obſerv'd by the Americans before they go on theſe exerciſes, 97. Preparations for chaſing the wild bull. Dance the Calumet. A piece of cloth carried by way of ſtandard. They halt to bewail the death of thoſe wild bulls they ſhould kill, and make a fire of bulls dung dry'd in the ſun. Young Savage, the firſt time he goes a hunting, prepares himſelf by faſting, and daubs his face with black. Devotes a piece of fleſh from every door to the great ſpirit, ibid.

Husbandry of the Americans, 59. They don't till the ground as we do. Turn it up with wooden hooks, and grub up all the weeds. Manure the ſoil with the aſhes of 'em, and fiſh-ſhells. Sow their corn in May, as we do our beans. Harveſt being come, they hoard their corn in pits, they having no apartments above-ground, ibid. Several Europeans uſed to do the ſame, 60.

Huſcanawing of the Virginians, 108. Celebrated every 15 or 16 years. The beſt-ſhap'd, and moſt ſprightly youths choſen for this diſcipline. Dangerous to refuſe undergoing it. Shut up for ſeveral months, and have no ſuſtenance allowed, but a decoction which turns the brain. Deſcription of the huts in which they are ſhut up. Theſe youths loſe their memory. Are not allow'd to remember any thing after the ceremony. Several die under this cruel probation. Oblig'd to a religious ſecreſy during this ſevere diſcipline. To reveal any thing of it, is puniſh'd with death. Reaſons the Virginians give for this probation; to root out the prejudices of youth, &c. ibid. The antients had pretty near the ſame notions, 109.

I.

JAGUIS of three kinds, 317. 1ſt. Vanapraſtas, who live in woods with their wives, &c. and feed on herbs, &c. Some think it a ſin to pluck up roots. 2dly, The San-jaſiis affect a greater abſtinence. Live on alms, ibid. Are not ſuffered to lie two nights together in the ſame place, once a year excepted, 318. Muſt conſtantly oppoſe ſix enemies, luſt, anger, avarice, pride, love of things of this world, thirſt for revenge, &c. 3dly, The Avadoutas abandon their wives and children, &c. and keep only a bit of cloth to cover the pudenda. Rub their bodies with aſhes, ibid.

Idolatry of the Americans, 11. Two kinds of Idolatry, both almoſt as old as mankind. The firſt, the worſhip of the ſtars and elements; the ſecond, that of man; both roſe from pride and fear. The leaſt trifles or gugaws thought agreeable to God, ibid. Idolatrous worſhip in the main of the ſame texture, 12. Whether a ridiculous worſhip, or atheiſm, moſt agreeable to the deity. Bayle has determined for the latter. Leſcarbot of the ſame opinion. A quotation from him. Antient idolaters ſuppoſed ſubaltern deities. The Americans alſo. The Canadans believe there's a devil and genii in inanimate things. Their belief in a God, his ſon, his mother, and the planet of the ſun. Creed of the Virginians, Floridians. The bare light of reaſon informs mankind they ought to believe in a ſuperior being, ibid. Canadans believe the devil throws duſt into their eyes, n. ibid. American ideas of God and the devil, bears a conformity to two Eaſtern principles. Greeks and Romans had good and evil genii. The South-Americans think arrows inform'd with genii. The antient ſuppoſed an univerſal ſpirit, ibid. The notions the Americans have of the ſupreme being abſorb'd in fictions, 13. Fables, the offspring of a crazy imagination. Idea which the Americans have of the deity, examin'd. That like children they form it agreeble to their little capacity. Prov'd from an ignorant father's inſtilling fantaſtical notions of the deity into his child. The whole made up of puerilities. The child thus taught, adds afterwards his own ſilly whims to what he had imbib'd. This argument illuſtrated, from the ſuppoſition of a king, who was to prohibit his ſubjects knowledge in general, and command them to live in a wild manner, whereby they'd ſoon become very illiterate. Inference to the Americans, ibid.

Idolatry and pagaviſm, chief cauſes of it, 208. Moſt religions aroſe from ſomething good. The fabulous hiſtory of the gods founded on truth, but very much diſguiſed. Surpriſing how ſo great a change in religion could be wrought. What things are the firſt cauſes of error. Another cauſe of idolatry, the idea which men had always form'd to themſelves of the divine being. Reflections on it. Mankind firſt ador'd the planets. Next fire. Reaſons of this, ibid. Firſt worſhipp'd as the ſun's repreſentative, 209. The Chaldeans affirm, that fire is the ſtrongeſt and moſt powerful of all the gods. An Egyptian prieſt denies it, and proves his aſſertion thus. He has a large ſtatue made of porous earth. Fills its belly with water, and ſtops the holes with wax. The Chaldeans prepare a fire, and the Egyptian prieſt puts his ſtatue againſt it. The wax diſſolves, the water pours forth and puts out the fire. In what manner the Egyptians ſolemnized this victory. The Perſians alſo worſhip fire, ibid. Fire carried at the head of Caravans in the Eaſt. Probably might be imitated from the pillar of fire which walked before the Iſraelites in the night, n. ibid. Fire carried before the Perſian kings, attended by 365 prieſts. Perpetual fire of the Grecks and Romans. Afterwards mankind worſhipp'd their own ſpecies; then beaſts, and the very refuſe of nature, ibid. The ſwelling ſtyle of the Eaſtern writers, increaſed idolatry, 210. The poets contributed greatly to it. The generality of mankind did not ſearch into the ſenſe ſhadowed under the figure, but conſidered the figure itſelf. Hence God is figur'd arm'd with a ſharp ſword, a bow and arrows; now gay, then angry, &c. Neceſſary houſe had at laſt its Goddeſs. Idolatry increaſed by the veneration which mankind had for every thing that came from their prieſts and elders, ibid.

Idols of the Bramins, and their worſhip, 247. Their divine worſhip different from that of the Chriſtians. Idols carried in proceſſion thro' the city. Deſcription of that, in honour of Viſtnou. The image ſet on a horſe carv'd in wood. A man fans the idol, and drives away the flies. A ſett of young proſtitutes dance in honour of the god. Opinion of Bramins, with regard to proſtitutes. Devendre aſſumes the figure of a man, viſits a curtezan, in order to try whether ſhe'd be faithful to him, ibid. Her great fidelity, ibid. 348. Would burn herſelf along with him. Devendre rewards her fidelity. The worſhip of images conſiſts in honouring and dreſſing them up. Are deck'd with flowers, rich clothes, jewels, waſh'd with eſſences, lamps lighted up before them. Victuals preſented to them. The viands how carried. Yearly feſtival of Viſtnou and Eſwara. Their images carried into a tower, which runs upon wheels. Deſcription of the whole, ibid.

St. Jerom travels over the Eaſt, to learn the maxims of its inhabitants, 196. Studied under a doctor of the ſchool of Tiberias, ibid.

Immortality of the ſoul, according to the Peruvians, 190. A diſtinction between ſoul and body; the latter called animated earth. Animals inform'd with a ſenſitive ſoul. Another life after this. The univerſe divided into three worlds. The devil's houſe. The life to come, a corporeal one. Happineſs of the bleſt. Hell filled with diſeaſes and evils. An univerſal reſurrection. Paring of their nails, and combings of their hair, laid by againſt the reſurrection. Endeavour to ſpit always in the ſame place, ibid.

Inchantment of the Eaſt-Indians, 243. Stories of modern miracles very much ſuſpected. Indian inchantments trifling. They teach adders to dance to the muſic of a flute. Carry them in baskets from houſe to houſe. Adders charm'd out out of gardens, ibid. Several popiſh miracles. Indians pretend to charm crocodiles, tygers, &c. n. ibid. Serpents may be delighted with muſical ſounds. Deſcription of conjuration with ſerpents, n. 244. The Indians take thoſe adders in their hands, 244. Story of an European ſoldier that kill'd an adder. The Egyptians, Phœnicians, Greeks and Romans worſhipp'd the ſerpent. An emblem of eternity, &c. Difficult to account for the veneration the Indians have for theſe venomous reptiles. Probably this Serpent borrowed from the ſtory of Adam and Eve. Such kind of people probably the firſt and only inchanters, ibid. The Jews borrowed from the Egyptians the juggling tricks ſo often mention'd in ſcripture, 245. Some perſons have in all ages been famous for their power over reptiles. Extraordinary things perform'd by the power of verſe, ibid.

Inchantments in India. 435.

India, in general, and the cuſtoms of its inhabitants, 268. The author's preamble. People who have never travell'd, form to themſelves an advantageous idea of other nations. God has diſtributed his bleſſings pretty equally over the whole globe. Particular deſcription of the landwinds which blow from the coaſt of Coromandel. Like ſo much fire thrown in a man's face, ibid. The perpetual ſummer in hot countries not ſo agreeable as our variety of ſeaſons, 269. Very great and regular rains. Rice the common food, how prepar'd. Game and fiſh enough. A great quantity of fruits. Particular deſcription of the Mangue. Lemmons and oranges. Caſſia-trees, the ſticks whereof being ſtruck againſt one another by the wind, make a ſtrange noiſe. Betel the next food to rice, ibid. 'Tis a plant that riſes like our virgin-vine, 270. Deſcription of it, and how 'tis prepar'd. Has a great many virtues. Preſent it as we do ſnuff. Very dangerous to take from the women, they making love-potions of it. A ſoldier is mad for a woman who had given him ſome of it. Uſeful in healing wounds. The greateſt part of India a deſart. Owing to the continual wars of the Great Mogul. The Aſiaticks a ſoft and effeminate people. They live in a moſt agreeable independance, ibid. A man lives at a ſmall expence, 271. The Indians in general divided into Moors, Heathens and Topas's or Meſtezos. Some account of the latter. Portugueſe formerly maſters of India. The inhabitants of Mocli rebel againſt the Portugueſe, and cut them all to pieces. Parias another ſort of Topas's. Call'd by the Heathen Indians Rice-Chriſtians, out of contempt. Theſe Parias are great villains. Their great dexterity in thieving with their toes. Think it beneath them to work after they turn chriſtians, ibid.

Indian idolaters, 567. Agree there is but one God, but form ſtrange ideas of him. God, the air we breathe; the ſun, boil'd rice; the letter O. The ſouls of the bleſſed iſſue thro' the crown of the head, fly with the ſwiftneſs of an arrow thro' the ſun to everlaſting bliſs, ibid.

Jugglers of America, and their manner of treating the ſick, 84. The Savages very healthy. Voluntary deaths of their old people, ibid. Deſcription of it, ibid. Laſt words to the family, 85. His beſt-lov'd child ſtrangles him. Think dying in old age a happineſs. Jugglers cure diſeaſes of the legs and thighs by lancing. Have a potion to expel poiſon. Jugglers are prieſts and phyſicians. Their probation before they are admitted as ſuch. Are ſhut up nine days in a hut, and live only upon water. Invoke the ſpirit with terrible howlings and diſtortions. Comes out and boaſts he has diſcover'd the ſpirit. Their cures owing to chance rather than ſkill. Are nevertheleſs acquainted with ſeveral phyſical herbs, ibid. A juggler is a kind of quack, who fancies himſelf immortal, and is endow'd with the virtue of healing all diſeaſes, 86. The jugglers laugh'd at behind their backs. The juggler viſits a patient. Examines him very carefully. Sings, dances, and howls. Sucks the patient's body, and pretends to draw bones out of it. The juggler often kill'd for not healing his patient. This quackery opens with a banquet. The phyſician comes into the aſſembly with a bag on his ſhoulder, and a gourd bottle in his hand. All ſeized with enthuſiaſtic fits. The juggler dances round the patient. Touches every part of his body. Tells him he has a ſpell in ſuch a part of it, which muſt be thrown out. The relations of the patient ſing over the wound. A great kettle brought in, and the preſents to the juggler put into it. He falls into a kind of lethargy, and tells the ſtanders by he has found out the diſtemper. Tortures the patient prodigiouſly by the medicines he applies. How artful jugglers excuſe themſelves when unſucceſsful, ibid. This quacking trade very beneficial. Some boaſt they can kill an enemy tho' at two hundred leagues diſtance, 87. Another remarkable kind of juggling. When the patient fancies he is bewitched, he is extended on the ground before the juggler, and a roe-buck skin thrown over him. The phyſician throws himſelf violently on the patient; foams at the mouth, ſucks his blood, &c. The juggler pretends to pull out a ſpell, which he ſhews to the aſſembly. Some jugglers give out certain charms of uſe in war. The moſt eminent of theſe are lame or crooked. Oblige the patients to run through flames. Preſcribe dances. Plunge the ſick perſon naked into ſnows, &c. in the depth of winter. Conſecration of the medicines after a very myſterious manner, ibid.

Ixora, the ſame as Eſwara. His extraordinary ſtory, 410. The world no bigger than a drop of dew; changes to an egg, cover'd with ſeven coats like that of an onion. Other ſtrange particulars. Ixora how imag'd, ibid. & 411. Ixora the infinite and eternal matter. Reflections on the Gods in India, ibid.

Ixora worſhipped under the name of Mahadeu, 425. Particulars of it, ibid. & 426. Ixora under the image of Lingam, 426, & 427.

K.

KAMAETZMA, Wife to Ixora or Eſwara, 429. Her pagod. A remarkable ceremony in her honour, ibid. & 430.

L.

LANGUAGES of the Americans, 24. Various dialects among 'em. Subject to great changes, ibid. A vaſt number of them, ibid. Theſe changes in their languages owing to the Europeans, and the frequent removals of the Americans, 25. The Peruvians had formerly a tongue peculiar to their religion. Obſervation of the Canadan tongues. Several letters they can't pronounce. Difficulty of pronouncing a foreign language in perfection. That we imprint the peculiar character of our own nation, on the accent of a tongue we learn. Examples of the Dutch, Germans, Engliſh, Italians, and French. The moſt unpoliſh'd tongues leaſt compounded. Thoſe of the Americans very ſimple, ibid. Savages of Canada underſtood by themſelves only, n. ibid. The Engliſh clear'd of the aſperſion, that they're a fickle people, by Monſ. Muralt, ibid. Manner how children attain a language, 26. That were children left to themſelves, they would form a tongue of their own, which would be vaſtly ſimple. The Americans had no uſe of

of letters, and were aſtoniſh'd that the Europeans could expreſs their thoughts by 'em, ibid. How inſtinct teaches us ſeveral inarticulate ſounds, ſuch as the noiſe made by the falling of a houſe, &c. from Du Bos's Critical Reflections on Poetry and Painting, n. ibid.

Law, ceremonial, contain'd in the book of the Banians call'd the Shaſter, 295. Enjoin'd frequent waſhings. Origin and particulars of it. Smear'd their bodies in the mud of rivers, ibid. Sins abſolv'd thereby, 296. Painted red in the forehead to diſtinguiſh themſelves as God's people. Motives for it. To make prayers and oblations under green trees. A tree particularly uſed for that purpoſe. Deſcription of it. Look'd upon as ſacred. Subject of their prayers. They are enjoin'd certain prayers in the temple. Proceſſions, ringing of bells, worſhip of images. Pilgrimage to rivers very remote. Invocation of ſaints. Worſhip of the almighty upon firſt ſeeing any creature after ſun-riſe. The ſun and moon the two eyes of God, ibid. Beſmear the floors with dung, 297. Baptiſm of children. Differs according to the ſeveral caſtes. A pen put to the child's forehead. An unction of red ointment. The Bramine children anointed with oil. Their nativity calculated. Their marriages at ſeven years of age. A great unhappineſs to die unmarried. How perſons are married. Songs ſung in praiſe of the bride and bridegroom. A ſplendid ſhew to ſolemnize the nuptials. The bridegroom in nuptial pomp, with a noble retinue. The bride with like pomp. A fire made. A ſilk ſtring put round both their bodies. A type of what, ibid. A cloth put between both, 298. The bleſſing pronounced. No dowry. Several particular injunctions. Muſt not marry out of their caſtes. Their burials. Behaviour towards dying perſons. They pray to the god of the waters. The corps waſh'd. Carried to a river-ſide. The Bramins prayer over it. A fire made, and the ſpeech to it. A pot of water, and veſſel of milk. The body burnt to aſhes, and theſe thrown into the air. Speech to the elements, ibid. The Bramins exhortation to the neareſt relation of the deceas'd, 299. Women that burn themſelves with their husbands. Verſes from Propertius. Origin of this cuſtom, according to Strabo. Second marriages forbid. Ceremony of the women's burning 'emſelves with their husbands, ibid.

Law-ſuits, none among the Americans, 66. How the Mexicans decided all diſputes. Their ſentences very conciſe. No delay of ſuits, except appealing to the tribunal wherein the king preſided. Happy country in that reſpect. The Floridians have recourſe to umpirage. The Turks not plagu'd with the captious formalities of our laws. In Perſia, every man pleads his own cauſe. The Chriſtians the greateſt wranglers in the world. Quære, why they ſhould be ſo? A ſuppoſition to what it is owing, ibid.

Lord, the reverend Mr. Lord, chaplain to the Engliſh factory at Surat, his diſcovery of the ſect of the Banians, 273. Preface, containing his motives for writing that work, 275, 276. Introduction, 277.

Love of one's country, 63. That 'tis not always the reſult of reaſon or duty, ibid. 'Tis the effect of cuſtom, education, and complexion, 64. Many people troubled with what the French call la maladie du pais, or a hankering after one's country. 'Tis ſometimes incurable. The Savages have ſome characteriſtics of it. In the Spaniſh conqueſts of Mexico and Peru, we meet with the moſt excellent inſtances of this. Their glorious conduct on this occaſion, muſt not be aſcrib'd to a Savage brutality. The ſpeech which the emperor Guatimozin made to Cortez, vaſtly noble and heroic. The Chilians have fought for their liberties upwards of 200 years. The Floridians not yet ſubdu'd. Another kind of love for one's country, which makes us idolize our own, and deſpiſe others. Very ridiculous, ibid. The Greeks, Romans, and Chineſe, have given into this abuſe, 65. The Mexicans alſo. The Engliſh haughtineſs towards other nations cenſur'd, ibid. This aſperſion clear'd by Monſ. Muralt, in his character of the Engliſh and French nations, n. ibid. Is of opinion, that the Swiſs have very much corrupted themſelves, by frequenting the French, n. ibid. The French partially fond of their own country. Fantaſtic fondneſs which ſome nations have for what is ridiculous when of their own country. That the inhabitants of the moſt Savage climes preſer them to other countries, tho' moſt beautiful, exemplify'd by the Greenland Savages, who came to the king of Denmark's court, ibid. Story of a Hottentot, who was brought to England, and was kindly uſed; but could not be eaſy till he return'd home, n. ibid. That this is not to be wonder'd at, ibid. That it proceeds partly from pride, 66. Vanity of young Frenchmen who have not ſeen the world, ibid.

M.

MAN, according to the Eaſt-Indians, 390. Came originally from the god Bruma's face, thighs, legs, &c. Caſte of Xandalam had in great contempt. Inſtances of it, ibid. & 391. The Bramins only endu'd with ſouls. Mankind in general animated with one ſoul. Tranſmigration. Arguments of the Indians to prove it, ibid.

Mango-capac, the great legiſlator of the Peruvians, 172, &c.

Marriage of the Peruvians, 186. Of the Incas's relations. The young men and maids of the royal family aſſemble annually, ibid. The marriage agreed upon, and the Incas ſets himſelf in the midſt of them, 187. Made them promiſe a mutual faith. Theſe were call'd the lawful wives. The relations furniſh'd the moveables. The governours oblig'd to marry the young people of their provinces in the ſame manner. Several injunctions. The heir to the crown uſed to marry his own ſiſter. The blood of the ſun muſt not be mix'd with that of men. In what manner the ſucceſſion to the crown was regulated. The king's lawful wife and miſtreſſes, ibid. The bridegroom uſed to go to the bride's houſe, and put a kind of ſhoe upon her foot, 188. Particular deſcription of the royal habit of the Incas's, ibid.

Marriage ceremonies of the Caribees, 127. Jealous of their wives. May kill 'em on a bare ſuſpicion. The wives are ſlaves to their husbands, and very ſweet and affable. A feaſt made when girls arrive at puberty; and they now wear an apron. An odd experiment of ſuch as will be good houſe-wives. Their mothers guard them very ſtrictly. Relations may marry with one another. Degrees prohibited. A man ſometimes marries three or four ſiſters. Their reflections on this head. A whimſical cuſtom, with regard to women with child. Have commerce with girls of ſeven or eight years of age, ibid. Cruel ceremony obſerved by fathers at the birth of their firſt-born, 128. He is wounded all over his body, drink pour'd down his throat, &c. The child's face ſmear'd with blood, to make him grave. The new-born infant bathed, and its face ſquaſh'd. The child's name taken from ſome tree, &c. Its ears, lower-lip, and noſtrils bored. Pendants put into 'em, ibid.

R.

RAM, the beginning of the third age, according to the Banians, and the reſtoration thereof by Ram, 306. Dreadful picture of the world after Ruddery had deſtroy'd mankind. Carcaſes of men ſtrew'd up and down. The former diſorders owing to the wickedneſs of kings, and therefore the caſte of the Cutterys deſtroy'd. Line of the kings renew'd from the Bramins. A good king nam'd Ram. Does many worthy acts, and maintains religion in its purity. Is had in high veneration among 'em to this day. Excellent kings for many years, but at laſt the world degenerates again. The almighty is angry, when the earth opens and ſwallows them all up alive, which concludes the third age of the world, ibid.

Ram, his wonderful ſtory, 394, & ſeq.

Ratjasja's, created by Brahma, 244. Unhappy and noxious intelligences. Their puniſhment. Condemn'd to flit up and down, &c. Some were once men, &c. Are man-eaters, ibid.

Rats, averſion which the Eaſt-Indians have to 'em, 237. Univerſally hated by the Jews.

Ravanen, a monſter with twenty ſhoulders and arms, 395. His groteſque ſtory, ibid.

Records of the Caribees, 129. Put peas into a gourd-bottle, in order to remember any day. Put marks upon pieces of wood to remember things.

Records of the Floridians, 122. Hieroglyphicks and events. A little ſtone pyramid erected, where any memorable event happen'd, ibid.

Records of the Peruvians, 193. Computations made by Quippos, or knots. Strings of different colours, which had a peculiar ſignification. How they regiſtred different incidents by theſe. Some ſtrings had very thin twiſts in them. Computed decimally on theſe ſtrings. Seldom went farther than hundreds of thouſands, ibid. The knots of each ſtring were equal, 194. Thoſe who kept theſe regiſters call'd Quippocamayas. Were ſo many checks upon one another. The tribute paid the Incas's computed by knots. Battles, ſkirmiſhes, embaſſies, &c. The moſt memorable incidents work'd up into ſhort fables, and got by heart. Alſo made into verſe, which they ſung at coronations.

Religion of the Savages who inhabit the river Amazons, &c. 165. Worſhip idols, ſome of which are thought to preſide over the waters. Carry their deities in caſes. They divide the government of all things among the gods, 165. Theſe gods are no more than genii, 166. Stand in great awe of their prieſts, who direct 'em in all things. Their bones preſerv'd as ſo many reliques.

Religion of the Braſilians, 166. Have no temples dedicated to the deity. No notion of the creation of the world. Some idea of the flood. Stand much in fear of the devil, and of thunder, ibid. Pay a great veneration to a certain fruit call'd Tamaraca, 167. Prieſts go their viſitation with 'em. Deſcription of it. The ſpirit preſent after a divine manner. Savages who have ceremonies like thoſe of the Roman catholicks. Eſſential part of their feſtivals conſiſt in dancing and ſongs. Their captives kill'd and eat in their aſſemblies. Prieſts interpret dreams. Can divert plagues and diſeaſes, and conſult the oracle for that purpoſe, ibid.

Religion of the inhabitants of Campeche, Jucatan, Tabaſco, &c. 153. Idols of Campeche, in various, but dreadful ſhapes. Large ſtatues on a kind of ſcaffold. Savages of Jucatan had a kind of circumciſion. Croſſes found among them by the Spaniards. The idol in the temple of Cozumel. The idol how repreſented. Figures of marble and earth reſembling bears, ibid. The god of rain worſhipp'd under the figure of a croſs, 154. Ceremonies uſed on that occaſion. Victims ſacrificed in Tabaſco. The blood fell in a ſtone reſervoir. The heart tore out, ibid.

Religion of the inhabitants of the Caribee Iſlands, 122. Moſt of the inhabitants deſtroy'd by the Spaniards. The Savages exclaim againſt their injuſtice, ibid. "We, ſay they, have been drove "unjuſtly from our habitations. Your country "muſt certainly be miſerable, ſince you attempt "to turn me out of mine, &c." Reflections on the injuſtice of the Europeans. Some ſo infatuated, as to attempt to juſtify the cruel havock which have been made of the Americans, by principles drawn from religion. The Caribees butcher'd more than any other people. The Caribees have no word to expreſs the deity. Probably the Chriſtians confuſe the Americans by too great a multitude of arguments. Would have theſe Savages comprehend at once the Chriſtian religion as well as they themſelves do. Theſe acknowledge a good and evil principle. Each Savage fancies he has a ſpirit to himſelf, &c. ibid. Leokos the firſt man from whom all are deſcended, 124. That afterwards he aſcended into heaven. Have ſome idea of the flood. Maboia the author of eclipſes. They pray to the evil ſpirit, but after a very irregular manner. Think it unneceſſary to pray to the good one. That the ſun preſides over the ſtars, which ſuperintend meteors. They preſent offerings to their Chemens. Think the ſpirits eat their oblations. The proof they give of it. Little images repreſenting Maboia. Cut and flaſh them elves for his ſake. Evil ſpirits ſcratch, beat, and wound them cruelly. A friar aſſures the devil has no power where a croſs is ſet up. Savages run into Chriſtian houſes to preſerve themſelves againſt ſatan. Numberleſs omens and ſuperſtitions. That wing'd bats are Chemens. Conſult the hair or bones of their relations, ibid.

Religion of the inhabitants of Cibola, New-Albion, New-Mexico, California, &c. 99. Savages of Cibola live under a well-conſtituted government. Worſhip nothing but water. Religion of the Savages of New Albion, from Sir Francis Drake, ibid. The king abdicates his crown in favour of him, 100. Sir Francis refuſes the crown. They make offerings to him at the ſame time. Savages of New-Mexico worſhip idols. The devil's among the reſt. Chapels dedicated to him. Savages of Los Quires, worſhip the ſun, moon, and ſtars. Californians worſhip the ſun. Ferdinand Alarchon puts a trick upon the Savages, by pretending to be the ſon of that planet. He ſets up a wooden croſs, and orders them to worſhip it. They worſhip the moon, and cut off their hair, ibid.

Religion of the Savages of Cubagua, Caribana, and Nova-Andaluſia, 162. Worſhip the ſun and moon, and above all an evil being. Adore the dry ſkeletons of their anceſtors. The ſun occaſion'd a great conflagration in their country. How the Savages of Caribana receive the ſpirit of courage. Opens with ſongs and dances, when they foam at the mouth. The prieſts whiff the dancers with tobacco, ſaying, Receive all of ye the ſpirit of ſtrength, &c. ibid. All their articles of faith reduced to dances and homages, 163. In what their whole religion conſiſts, ibid.

Religion of the Savages of Darien, Panama, New-Granada, and Cumana, 156. Thoſe of Darien have no exterior marks of religion. Their god is the moon's husband. Preſent flowers, fruits, &c. to the evil principle. Frequent apparitions ſuppos'd to be ſeen here. Magical incantation of their prieſts. Strange noiſes made at it. A very extraordinary manner of healing the ſick, by by ſhooting arrows at the patient. Indian kings who had their palaces on trees, ibid. Daibaba, mother to the creator of heaven and earth. She ſends thunder and lightning upon mankind when angry. Prieſts oblig'd to an inviolable chaſtity. Savages of Tunia worſhip an idol call'd Chiappen. On what occaſion they addreſs it. Cures perform'd by their prieſts. Savages of Cumana and Paria look upon the ſun and moon as their gods. Affliction when ſhe is eclips'd. Comets thought ill boding and pernicious. Idols worſhipp'd. If the patient cannot be cured, the prieſts affirm him to be poſſeſs'd with an evil ſpirit. 'Tis exorcis'd. Manner of it. The patient vomits blood, ibid. The prieſt cries, May the devil go out from hence, 158. The prieſts conſulted in ſolitudes, and in the night. How the devils are conjur'd up. Fryars exorciſe a prieſt who was raiſing the devil. Probation of ſuch as are deſign'd for the prieſthood, ibid.

Religion of the Floridians, 113. Acknowledge the ſun and moon for deities. Temples, but only to bury their dead in, and to lodge their wealth. Compar'd to ſome idolatrous nations of antiquity, ibid. The Floridians ador'd a pillar, offer'd ſacrifices to it, crown'd it with flowers, &c. 114. They worſhip the devil under the name of Toia, only out of fear. They believe he makes inciſions in their fleſh. Terrifies 'em in dreams. Their prieſts are in reality the evil genius. Particulars of the religions of the Carolinans. They don't think that the affairs of men deſerve God's care, &c. Savages of Apalache worſhip the ſun. Seem to have preſerv'd ſome footſteps of the flood. That the waters of a great lake overflow'd the whole world, one mountain excepted, where thoſe who had retired to it were ſaved. Worſhip of the Apalachites. Conſiſts in ſaluting the riſing-ſun, and ſinging hymns to him. Offer incenſe to it, ibid. The prieſts withdraw into the mountains to prepare for this ceremony, 115. Fires burning all night. The prieſts only allow'd acceſs to the religious edifice. The oblations hung on poles. The prieſts ſing the praiſes of the ſun; the inſtant he breaks out, throw incenſe into the ſacred fire, and pour honey into a ſtone. Birds that are thought to ſing in praiſe of the ſun. Ceremony concludes with ſports, dances, and diverſions. Six birds of the ſun let fly. A proceſſion of devotees into the temple. That of the ſun, a ſpacious grotto, made by nature in the rock. Deſcription of it. A temple uſed as a burial-place for their great men. Here the Spaniards found dead bodies, laid in cheſts, and placed on ſhelves. The temple, or burying-place of the Caciques. Deſcription of it. One hundred paces long, and forty broad. Wall'd round. Roof made of ſlender reeds, ibid. Carpets made of theſe ſpread over, 116. Shells and fiſhes rang'd beautifully upon the roof. A kind of feſtoons made of mother of pearl. Large gates to the temple. Twelve gigantic ſtatues of wood at the entrance. Theſe had a very menacing aſpect. Arm'd with weapons. The firſt have clubs; the ſecond poll-axes; the third a kind of oar, &c. Cornice of the inſide of the temple of large ſea-ſnail ſhells, and feſtoons of pearls between them. Feathers of various colours. Two rows of ſtatues. The one of men, the other of women. All ſet in niches. Statues of the men have weapons. Coffins of the great men of the province. Their ſtatues above 'em, ibid. Shields of different ſizes, 117. Adorn'd with pearl and tufts of ſeveral colours. Multitude of cheſts fill'd with pearl, ſet pyramidically. Great bundles of wild-goats skins of different colours. A great ſtore-houſe round the temple. Divided into eight halls, fill'd with military weapons. Pikes finely adorn'd. Clubs adorn'd with rings of pearl, and tufts of different colours. Bows, enamell'd with ſeveral colours. Bucklers finely ſet off. Some ſacrifice their firſt-born to the ſun. Perform'd before the Cacique. The mother makes ſad moan, ibid. The prieſt daſhes out the child's brains, 118. A ſtag's skin ſtuff'd, offer'd to the ſun. Prayers and ſongs at the ſame time. Beſeech the ſun to bleſs the earth. Devotion paid to Toia, or the evil principle. 'Tis a deep act of contrition. They aſſemble in a large place. Three prieſts, painted from head to foot, come and dance, ſing, and make wry faces. The aſſembly anſwer in chorus. They quit the diverſion, and fly to the woods and conſult Toia. The women howl, ſlaſh their young girls, and throw the blood into the air. The prieſts return to the woods and dance, and the whole concludes with an entertainment. Floridians and Mexicans boaſt of a prophecy, ibid.

Religion of the Savages of Hiſpaniola, 129. They pretended their demons had told 'em their country would be conquer'd by a bearded nation, ibid. They look upon the Chemens, or Zemes, as the meſſengers or agents of a ſole, ſupreme, &c. Being. Whimſical account of theſe Chemens, n. ibid. Songs, whoſe ſubjects were the exploits of their anceſtors, &c. 130. Prieſts ſtupified with the fumes of tobacco, utter incoherent rhapſodies. Worſhip of their demons. The prince, at the head of his ſubjects, goes to the temple of the gods, who were repreſented in a frightful ſhape. Prieſts offer cakes to 'em. They dance and ſing. Pieces of theſe cakes conſider'd as preſervatives againſt many accidents. As they paſs by their idols, they put a little ſtick down their own throats, to make themſelves vomit. Their Zemes, or Chemens, reveal'd 'emſelves to the prieſts and people. Their origin of mankind. Men came out of two caverns, ibid. From the one the good, from the other the bad, 131. Are chang'd into trees, frogs, &c. Sun and moon came firſt out of a grotto. Polygamy allow'd. Their Caciques had 30 wives, at leaſt. Believ'd that ghoſts uſed to have carnal knowledge of women. Other ridiculous particulars.

Religion of the Savages of Hudſon's-Bay, 71. Very difficult to give a rational deſcription of the religion of the inhabitants of North-America. Thoſe of Hudſon's-bay have no diſtinct principles of religion. The licentious and vagrant life of the Savages, prevents their attaining to the knowledge of the true God. They ſeem to acknowledge a good and evil principle. To the one they owe their proſperity. The other afflicts them, ibid. Manitou, the name theſe Savages give to a genius, which they think reſides not only in beings which have life, but alſo in inanimate things. They ſet Manitou in their huts, and ſacrifice dogs, &c. to it, n. ibid. They look upon the ſun as the ſovereign of the univerſe, 72. Offer him tobacco by way of incenſe. Deſcription of the ceremony of ſmoaking the ſun. The Manitou addreſs'd in their common worſhip, ibid. The Savages think the Calumet a preſent from the ſun to mankind, n. ibid. Whimſical opinion how ſtorms are raiſed, 73. How they endeavour to lay them. Jugglers addreſs'd to reveal futurity. The juggler raiſes a hut, ſhuts himſelf in it; ſings, ſheds tears, tumbles up and down. The ſilly Savages fancy he then has correſpondence with Matchimanitou. The hut ſhakes ſo violently, that one would think it were coming to the ground, when the juggler pronounces the oracle, ibid.

Religion of ſome nations ſubject to the Incas's, 182. The idol Ramac worſhipp'd under a human ſhape. Vaſt veneration paid to Pachacamac. Tygers, adders, and an herb worſhipp'd. A priſoner of diſtinction ſacrificed. His body ſlaſh'd with knives and razors. His fleſh cut from his bones. Women gave this blood to their young children to ſuck, ibid. Such as ſuffer'd with bravery, rank'd among the gods, 183. The ſea, tygers,

Religion of the Mexicans and the neighbouring nations, 131. The greateſt part of it conſiſts in ſacrificing men to their idols. Compariſon between this and the cruelty of the Spaniards, in deſtroying ſo many Americans. Apology the Spaniards make for their conduct on that occaſion, ibid. An old Cacique upbraids the Chriſtians in the ſtrongeſt terms, n. 132. Firſt inhabitants of America, whence they came. Vitzliputzli, their god, declares how he would be worſhipp'd. Manifeſts his power by miracles. Other particulars concerning him. The god reveals himſelf to a prieſt in a dream. The city of Mexico built where a fig-tree was growing out of a rock, and an eagle perch'd upon it. This ſtory has ſome affinity with the entrance of the Iſraelites into Canaan, ibid. Poſſibly ſome Jews had come among 'em, 133. That the firſt cauſe could not govern the world, without the aſſiſtance of a numberleſs multitude of genii. The ſun was the ſecond god. Vitzliputzli's idols, repreſented with great pomp and magnificence. Particulars of it. Seated on a throne, ſupported by an azure globe. Tlaloch, another idol reſembling the former. The idea the Mexicans had of its power, ibid. Teſcalipuca, the god of penance, 134. Deſcription of this magnificent idol. An ear hangs from his hair, and is an emblem of the divine mercy in hearing petitions. A great many emblematical figures round the idol. Repreſented under another grand, but terrible form. Deſcription of the Mercury and Pluto of the Mexicans. Tozi, a goddeſs of mortal extraction. She is put to death, flay'd, and a young man cover'd with her skin. Another idol made of all the ſeeds of the earth, kneaded together with the blood of young children. This idol pull'd to pieces from time to time, given as reliques, and another put in its place, ibid. A holy water at the coronation of their monarchs, 135. Mexicans had upwards of 2000 deities, who had each his temple, &c. A priſoner treated as a god for ſix months, and afterwards ſacrificed, ibid.

Religion of the Savages of Miſſiſippi, Canada, Terra Nova, Iroquois, &c. 73. Have little notion of religious worſhip. Pay a kind of worſhip to the ſun. Preſent the Calumet to him, and beſeech him to take a whiff or two. Offer to him the firſt-fruits they take in hunting. Ceremonial habits of theſe Savages very whimſical. They believe the world was created. Heaven, earth, and men were made by a woman, ibid. The woman being big with child, fell down from heaven, and dropt on the back of a tortoiſe, who ſav'd her from ſhipwreck, 74. Ridiculous fable of theſe Savages, in what manner the world was peopled. Odd ſyſtem of the creation. That men came originally from beaſts. Groteſque account of the flood. A bridge made. All animals upon it. In danger of being ſtarv'd. The beaver, the otter, and a kind of rat ſent to ſearch for earth at the bottom of the ſea. A ſmall quantity of ſand ſwell'd to a high mountain. The fox walks round and round it, in order to enlarge the terreſtrial globe. Savages have odd notions of thunder, lightning, &c. ibid. Original of men and women, 75. Are married together. Their ſeveral occupations appointed. They live contented for ſome ages; diſcord and jealouſy ariſe, which are the origin of wars. Have banquets in honour of their gods. Dogs ſacrificed to the ſun. Mankind created out of arrows. Believe the Divine Eſſence is comprehended under four perſons. The univerſal ſpirit that gives being and motion to matter, ibid. Savages vary in their opinions, with regard to who is the Divine Being, 76. They invoke rivers, floods, and waterfalls. Their offerings at the ſame time. They ſupplicate the ſpirit of the Cataract. Horace quoted on this occaſion, n. ibid. Subject of their prayers. Sacrifice captives in its honour. Have neither temples, ſacrifices, or prieſts. Their extravagant notion of inſpiration, ibid. The quakers mention'd on this occaſion, n. ibid. Reflections on theſe heads. Their jugglers pronounce their oracles, interpret dreams, boaſt that rain, hail, fruitfulneſs, &c. are under their direction. The Savages aſcribe a reaſonable ſoul to ſeveral ſorts of beaſts. That their ſouls return to ſee how their bodies are treated. Their belief in prodigies, and dread of thunder, 77. Some carry the ſkeleton of a crow along with 'em. Others owls, ſea-fiſhes, or bones. Savages of Miſſiſippi have a kind of temple dedicated to the ſun. Sacrifices to the moon when in the wane. Deſcription of one of theſe temples. The heads of their enemies fix'd on the walls of it. A flaming altar. The tabernacle of the god, ibid. Holy fire of the Romans kept by the Veſtals, n. ibid. Great ſpirit of the Canadans, ibid. Guedeville cenſur'd, for interſperſing La Hontan's travels with jeſting and buffoonery, n. 78. The metaphyſical manner in which the Savages expreſs their belief, with regard to the firſt principle, 78.

Religion of the Nicaraguans, 154. Sacrificed men. Their prieſts were confeſſors, and oblig'd to live in a ſtate of celibacy. The moſt remarkable circumſtance in their ſacrifices. The human victim cut to pieces, and the limbs diſtributed. Other bloody ceremonies. Privileges of thoſe who were thus butcher'd. A proceſſion on theſe occaſions. Deſcription of it. They draw blood from one another, to ſmear the idol's face. Young people now dance and make merry. Maiz ſprinkled with blood, ibid.

Religion of the Savages of Oroonoko and Guiana, 164. Some worſhip Watipa, or the devil. Others think the ſun and moon living beings. Others worſhip a groteſque ſtatue of a man. Some think God a corporeal Being, ibid.

Religion of the Peruvians, 172. Worſhipp'd a multitude of gods, or genii. Every ſtreet, houſe, &c. had its peculiar deity. Worſhipp'd plants, trees, &c. Uſed to ſacrifice their own chidren. The prieſt burnt the victim's heart. Some let themſelves blood betwixt the eye-brows. Mangocapac, their great legiſlator, ibid. He and his wife were children of the ſun, 173. Are diſpatch'd from that planet, to inſtruct and civilize the Peruvians. A golden rod given 'em. Relation of their journey. They ſtop at Cuſco. Make a great many proſelytes. Aboliſh the antient religion, ibid. What Mangocapac recommended particularly to the Peruvians, n. ibid. His artful conduct. Reflections on the conduct of antient legiſlators, ibid. Mangocapac deified. In what light the Peruvians conſider'd their Incas's. Temples built to the ſun, ibid. The moon call'd the univerſal mother of all things, 174. Thunder and lightning the executors of the ſun's juſtice; houſes ſtruck with thunder, deteſted, and ſtopt up with dirt and ſtones. A ſoul of the world, or firſt mover of matter, call'd Pachacamac. Their extraordinary veneration for that word. The ſun only animated the univerſe, ibid. Anſwer of one of the Incas's to a Spaniard, n. ibid. Cupac, the direct oppoſite character to Pachacamac. Huacas or Guacas, were the genii; beautiful, and even monſtrous things, &c. ibid. Their prayers of thanks to Pachacamac, 175. Pull up the hair of their eye-brows by way of offering to him. Offer ſplinters of wood, or even ſtraws. Several animals ſacrificed in honour of the ſun. They kiſs the air. Adoration made to trees. A kind of worſhip paid to the city of Cuſco, ibid.

Religion of the Savages of La Plata, &c. 170. Some conſecrate the skins of their enemies. Wherever there are prieſts, there muſt be ſome ſhadow of religion. Imagine every thing is inform'd with its peculiar genius or ſpirit. Probation for the prieſthood. Muſt fight againſt wild-beaſts. The impoſition of the tyger's paw look'd on as holy, ibid. Superior medico-prieſts, 171. Oblig'd to faſt rigorouſly ſeveral years. Aſſemblies at the new moon very whimſical. Every act of religion flows from a principle of fear. Certain prayers mumbled over the ſick. Pipes of tobacco ſmoaked for their ſakes. A wife may live where ſhe pleaſes, and her husband oblig'd to follow her up and down. Incontinency in women a moſt enormous crime. Injuſtice of our ſex on this occaſion, ibid. When a woman dies, her young children buried with her, 172. An obſcure idea of the immortality of the ſoul. Savages of Paraguay cut off their fingers and toes as their relations die, ibid.

Religion of the Virginians, 101. Their greatneſs of ſoul diſplay'd, in the perſon of the emperor of that country, who was taken priſoner by the Engliſh, ibid. 'Tis ſacrilege to reveal the principles of their religion, 102. Reflections on the contradictions of travellers. Deſcription of the temple of the Savages. Barricaded with 12 or 15 great logs of wood. 'Twas 30 feet long, and 18 feet wide. A hole in the roof to let out the ſmoke. No windows in it. A dark place incloſed. Bones and an Indian hanger in it. Wattles of a turkey-cock tied to it. Deſcription of the idol. Theſe images carefully conceal'd from the public view. Have a venerable aſpect in theſe dark places, ibid. This gloom heightens devotion, 103. The magician moves the idol up and down in the dark. They think that this idol is not one ſole being. The idol Kiwaſa. Repreſented under a variety of ſhapes. Chapels and oratories conſecrated to him. Has a pipe in his mouth, and ſmokes, the prieſt lying conceal'd behind. The god manifeſts himſelf in dreams or viſions. Savages are very much guided by inſpiration. The god conjur'd up by four prieſts. Appears under the figure of a handſome young man. They alſo worſhip the ſun. They waſh themſelves. The winds and ſeas under the direction of another deity, ibid. When they go a journey, they burn tobacco, to obtain the aſſiſtance of the ſun, 104. Throw tobacco into rivers, in order to obtain a ſafe paſſage. Ridiculous traditions of a rock, on which a giant left the print of his feet. Emblematical figures to repreſent the deity. Altars erected in all remarkable places. Chief altar of the Virginians. Religious houſes in which their kings were buried. Look'd upon as ſacred. The high altar of ſolid cryſtal, vaſtly tranſparent. Their altars call'd Paxorances, ibid. Their great veneration for a bird, who is continually repeating that name, 105. An Indian puniſh'd for killing one of them. Great veneration for theſe altars. Particular account of the notions which the Virginians have of the deity. That he delights in doing good. Allows free-will, and is himſelf ſupine, ibid. Verſes from Creech's Lucretius on this ſubject, n. ibid. They worſhip the devil, ibid. Fancy Kiwaſa inſpires them in all their actions. Are afraid of an evil genius, and therefore worſhip him. That he ruffles the air, raiſes ſtorms, &c. Other notions ſome nations have of the deity, ibid. He form'd a ſett of ſubaltern gods, ibid. The firſt thing they created was water, 106. Woman created before man, ibid.

Ruddery, one of thoſe who begins the ſecond age of the world, 288. Endued with power to deſtroy all creatures, ibid. Made the lord of death and judgment, 289. And therefore endued with every thing fit for that purpoſe, ibid. He diſperſes afflictions, ſickneſs, death, &c. 290.

Rutrem, his ſtory, 376. Third ſon of Paraxacti, and one of her husbands. Turns friar. Is infamouſly leud. Marries Parvadi, and uſes her kindly. The gods come to him, and force him to abandon her. This woman, who was laſcivious, curſes the gods for it. Rutrem wanders about like one diſtracted. The earth gives him a ſon with ſix heads, and the ſeven ſtars nurſe him. The Indians have the utmoſt veneration for Rutrem. Parvadi dies with grief, is born a ſecond time, and married to Rutrem, ibid. Deſires a child in Rutrem's abſence, and one ſprings from her ſweat, 377. Who inſtantly is full grown. Rutrem jealous, but is appeaſed. Extraordinary birth of a giant, by ſtriking a handful of hair violently againſt the ground. The giant attacks the gods, and knocks the ſun's teeth out. Kicks the moon in the face. A man kill'd, when he is raiſed from the dead, and an elephant's head fix'd on his body, ibid. Order'd to ſeek out a wife as beautiful as his mother Parvadi, 378. Cuts off one of his brother's heads; does penance for it, by ſtripping himſelf ſtark naked; covering his head with aſhes, taking the ſkull in his hand, &c. Rutrem grows weary of his auſtere life. Goes ſtark naked to a place where ſeveral Bramins liv'd, who had very beautiful wives. They fall in love with, and follow him whitherſoever he went. He is ſuddenly emaſculated by their husbands. Promiſes to crown with heavenly joys all who ſhould pay a peculiar honour to the injur'd parts. Rutrem is the Priapus of the antients. Honour'd under the figure of Lingam, which they wear about their necks. The Andis, a moſt infamous, impudent caſte, ibid. They make a trade of imitating Rutrem's penance, by rambling about naked, &c. 379. Stand in uneaſy poſtures, &c. in the pagods. They hold continually one of theſe Lingams in their hands. Some Andis's arms are ſtiff, wither'd, and immoveable, by holding them in the poſtures above-mention'd. At a diſtance they look like ſo many walking trees. Are univerſally honour'd as ſaints. Rutrem marries the river Ganges. Meets with various happy and unhappy adventures. Great danger to which he was expos'd. Rutrem granting a giant the privilege of reducing to aſhes whatever he ſhould touch, was going to try the experiment upon the god, ibid. Rutrem, to ſecure himſelf, contracts himſelf ſo as to lie in the ſhell of a fruit no bigger than the hazel-nut, 380. Vixnu, his brother, to reſcue him, aſſumes the ſhape of a beautiful woman, with whom the giant falls in love, when the latter neglects Rutrem; accoſts her, and ſhe yields upon certain conditions, which prove fatal to him; for laying his hands on his head, he is reduced to aſhes in an inſtant. Rutrem comes out of the ſhell, thanks Vixnu, and deſires him to reſume again the female ſhape; which he does, when Rutrem falls deſperately in love with her, &c. ibid.

S.

SACRIFICE of Libation. The water which David pour'd out before Bethlehem. Oil generally made uſe of on this occaſion. Jacob ſees the angels aſcending and deſcending a ladder. Oil provided always by travellers to pour out before the Lord. Libations perform'd by the Heathens with ſeveral other ſorts of liquors. Examples of it, ibid. Profound libations, 212. The Eaſt-Indians offer no bloody ſacrifices, becauſe of the tranſmigration of ſouls. Smear their deities with black. Agree with the Jews in ſeveral particulars of their worſhip. The female dancers among the Jews, proſtitutes. David's uncovering himſelf to dance before the ark. Chriſtian-Indians uſe trumpets, hautboys, and drums in their churches, ibid.

Sacrifices

Sacrifices and adorations of the Canadan Savages, 78. Good or evil intelligences, aſcribed to every thing that is wonderful in its kind. Gold and ſilver rank'd among the latter. Sacrifice to Kitchi-Manitou, coſts ſometimes upwards of 50,000 crowns. Deſcription of it. A pile erected; the Savages lay their offerings on it. Fire ſet to it. They ſing and dance round it the whole day, ibid. Subject of their prayer, 79. To be protected from the wicked, and have their families preſerv'd. That bleſſings may be ſhed on the harveſt, on villages and the hunters, &c. The ſubject of their ſongs. Praiſe of the beauty of nature, goodneſs of God; warriors dance the grand ſpirit-dance. How we might better diſcover the religion of the Americans. The perſons employ'd for that purpoſe, muſt be learned and unprejudic'd. Theſe Savages not atheiſts. Reaſons they ſometimes alledge for their not embracing Chriſtianity, ibid.

Sacrifices of the Eaſt-Indians, 211. Mankind have, in all ages, paid an outward worſhip to the deity. Uncertain whether there were any ceremonies at the riſe of oblations.

Sacrifices of the Mexicans, 136. Vaſtly barbarous, ibid. Deſcription of 'em. Victims led to the charnel-houſe, 137. Guarded by ſoldiers. The prieſts tore out their hearts, and threw their bodies down the terraſs. Forty or fifty victims always ſacrificed at a time. Prieſts who ſacrificed men, the chief in dignity. A man dreſs'd in the bloody skin of a human victim juſt ſacrificed, runs up and down the ſtreets and begs alms. Duel of the victim with the prieſt. If the latter conquer'd, he kill'd, flay'd, and eat him. Offerings to the ſun, ibid. Stoop'd to the vileſt offices in honour of their gods, 138.

Sacrifices and incenſing uſed by the Mexicans and Peruvians, 14. This perhaps of great antiquity among the Americans, 15. Human victims hard to be accounted for. Something offer'd on this head. God ſuppoſed to be appeaſed no other way. Why theſe barbarous ſacrifices were continued. That 'tis probable the Americans borrowed theſe cuſtoms no where, ibid.

Schaerrawackas, fourth ſect among the Bramins, 317. Don't believe in the immortality of the ſoul, but lead regular lives, ibid.

Scrupulouſneſs of the Eaſt-Indians upon ſeveral occaſions, 236. Behaviour of an Indian, who had met a French ſailor eaſing nature. Indians always do it in the moſt private manner poſſible. Heſiod adviſes the Greeks not to eaſe nature on the high-ways, &c. The Jews very delicate on this article, ibid.

Seaſons, how diſtinguiſh'd by the Peruvians, 192. The vulgar computed by their harveſts. By towers over which the ſun ſhone. Manner of this mathematical obſervation. Year conſiſted of twelve moons. Were acquainted with the equinoxes. Rejoicings made at theſe ſeaſons. How they found the equinox. The ſun worſhipp'd that day with great ſolemnity. Columns adorn'd with flowers and odoriferous herbs. The ſun's ſeat or throne, ibid. A great reſpect paid to columns, 193.

Seivias, the ſecond ſect of the Bramins, 316. Are known by ſtreaks which they make upon their heads with cow-dung aſhes, 317. The Lingam, a kind of ſtone which they wear about their necks.

Serpents worſhipp'd in India, 434, 435.

Settrea's, the ſecond caſte of the Brachmans, 313. Compos'd of the king and nobles, ibid. Duty of theſe is to defend and govern their country, &c. ibid.

Shaſter, book of the written word of the Banians, 290. God, to reſtrain the wickedneſs of mankind, gives them laws. Deſcends on a mountain, and calls Bremaw to him. Delivers him a book out of the clouds. Conſiſts of three parts; 1*ſt*, The moral law; 2*dly*, The ceremonial; 3*dly*, Precepts for the caſtes or legends. The Firſt, contains 8 commandments. 1*ſt*, Thou ſhalt not kill any creature whatſoever, &c. 2*d*, Thou ſhalt make a covenant with all thy five ſenſes, &c. 3*d*, Shalt duly obſerve the times of devotion, ibid. 4*th*, Shalt not tell any falſe tales, &c. 291. 5*th*, Shalt be charitable to the poor, &c. 6*th*, Shalt not oppreſs the poor, &c. 7*th*, Shalt celebrate certain feſtivals, &c. 8*th*, Shalt not ſteal from thy brother. Theſe commandments beſtow'd among the four caſtes, two being appropriated to each. Particulars of it. Some objections againſt theſe precepts. To the firſt and ſecond commandments, ibid. That they ſhould not kill any living creature, 292. A vegetative, ſenſitive, and reaſonable ſoul. The laſt more noble than the other two. Injunction not to ſlay human creatures, refuted from ſcripture. By the cuſtom of nations. The firſt Indians kill'd beaſts. The command not to drink wine refuted. The Romans forbid it, becauſe it occaſion'd exceſs. The Carthaginians, Egyptians, and Mahometans, conſider'd on this head, ibid. As alſo the Levites, the Nazarites, and Rechabites, 293. Learned men who pleaded for the drinking of wine, ſuch as Galen, Meneſytheus, Seneca, Plato, and Pythagoras. Objections to the other part of the ſecond commandment, viz. the eating of fleſh. Eggs muſt not be eat, becauſe life is ſuppos'd in the ſhell. Red roots abſtain'd from. The tranſmigration of ſouls. Not firſt ſtarted by the Indians. By the Egyptians, and then came among the Greeks; afterwards among the Romans, ibid. Pythagoras promulgates the doctrine of tranſmigration, 294. Another reaſon is, that the ſoul might be purified, as chymical eſſences, by paſſing thro' the Still. Proof of the ſoul's immortality, which invalidates the metempſychoſis. That the ſoul would be defiled by tranſmigration. Other arguments againſt this doctrine, ibid. From Adam's ſpeech to Eve, 295. From the New Teſtament. From the nature of ſoul and body. If this doctrine were true, the ſouls of beaſts muſt be immortal, ibid.

Shuddery, third ſon of Porous, 282. A merchant, and ſent out to the North. Takes his ſcales and weights with him, ibid. Wiſhes to meet with buſineſs, 283. Comes to a mountain. Immoderate rains falling, he ſhelters himſelf in the hollow of it. A deluge follows. The waters ſubſide, and he ſets out. Finds pearl-ſhells of a precious value. Comes to another mountain. A rock, or mine of diamonds. Shuddery ſuppoſes it to be fire. In amaze, he touches it with his finger. Day-light appears, and the luſtre diſappears. Breaks a piece of the rock, and carries it with him. Meets a woman call'd Viſagunda, at the ſide of a wood. He accoſts her. She is baſhful, ibid. His arguments why ſhe ſhould not fly him, 284. She ſtops, and they diſcourſe. She yields to his kind treatment. He adorns her with his pearls and diamonds. They people the North with traders, ibid.

Shudderys, the third caſte in India, 304. Are merchants. Properly call'd Banians, ibid.

Sick, how the Savages of Paria heal theirs, 163. Plunge them into a river. Whip them very ſeverely. The ſick man, when given over, is left in his hammock hung between two trees, ibid.

Sickneſs, death, and burial of the Bramins, 332. Abſtinence preferr'd to bleeding. The former very ſevere. The ſymptoms of death appear. Prayers and other ceremonies uſed. Asks his wife whether ſhe'll be burnt or buried with him. The duty of a wife conſiſts in three particulars. An implicit complacency for all her husband's deſires and wiſhes: Exemplified in the virtuous Draupeti, who, when her luſtful husband was ſo weak he could not walk; carried him to his ſtrumpets ſtrumpets upon her ſhoulders. She runs againſt a poſt on which a holy man was ſet. — His curſe. The ſun does not riſe for ſeveral years. She dies. Returns again upon earth, and marries five huſbands, ibid. Enjoys one of them annually, and falls into the fire, 333. Second duty of a wife, to go in a plain dreſs, and not junket when her husband's abroad. Third duty, To die when her husband leaves the world. To force a woman to be burnt, a crime that merits death. Two hideous ſpirits appear to a man at the point of death. If he is virtuous, one carries him away in a flying-chariot. If wicked, carried to Jammalocon, when he is ſent back to the world, where he skips up and down it like a hobgoblin. The ſick man dies. His beard ſhav'd, his body waſh'd, &c. The corps carried to the pile. A ſermon in the name of Death. Some Bramins buried, ibid.

Silk, knowledge the antients had of it, 252. The Indians eſteem arts according to their uſefulneſs. A plough-man placed in the firſt rank, and a goldſmith in the laſt. Little notion of ſculpture and deſigning. Famous for their manufactures of ſilk and cotton, ibid. Silk-worms firſt brought Anno 552 from India to Conſtantinople by certain monks, 253. Silk mentioned by the prophet Ezekiel. Silken habits among the Perſians a mark of great dignity. Whether the Sericum of the antients be the ſame with our ſilk. The modern manufactures of ſilk-ſtuffs entirely unknown to the Greeks and Romans, n. ibid. Highly probable that the Jews, the Greeks, and Romans had the ſame ſilk uſed in our days. Several fancied that ſilk was taken from the bark of a tree, after which 'twas comb'd and ſpun. Others, that 'twas made of a kind of wooll, ibid. Particulars concerning the labours of the ſilk-worm, 254. Of the ſilk-worms mention'd by Ovid. Sericum derived from a people call'd Seres, ibid. Who are thought to be the Chineſe, n. ibid. Enquiries where the country of the Seres might be ſituated, ibid.

Slaves among the Americans, 67. Their captives only ſo, whom they keep in their ſervice. Are often miſerably butcher'd. The inhabitants of Chios, the firſt who purchas'd free people for ſlaves. The revenge they drew down upon themſelves, ibid.

Smaertas, the third ſect of the Bramins, 317. Their tenets. Not diſtinguiſh'd by marks. Their doctrine couch'd under myſterious terms. Deliver'd in a moſt pompous phraſe, ibid.

Soothſayers, prieſts and prophecies of the Americans, 15. All are prieſts who are appointed to preſide over religious worſhip of what kind ſoever. Etymology of the word from the Greek ſignifies antient. Old people fitteſt to govern. Young people being unexperienced, and govern'd by their paſſions unfit for it. American prieſt always in years, ibid. The Mexican clergy govern'd by a kind of Pontifex maximus, 16. American prieſts are alſo phyſicians. Have wallets fill'd with herbs and drugs. Medico-prieſts in Aſia and Africa. Reaſons why the profeſſions were united. Antient phyſicians, like thoſe of America, uſed ſpells and inchantments. The Europeans alſo weak on this head. The Druids and Germans unite the two profeſſions. Prieſts in America have great influence in ſtate-affairs, ibid. Great power the prieſts have thereby arrogated, n. ibid. Caraibes make the people believe they hold a correſpondence with ſpirits, 17. And thereby pretend to do wonders. Braſilian prieſts pretend to endue with courage; to make the plants grow. Agnian their ſpirit. Affirm he torments people in the night. That prieſts of all religions ſet up for agents and ambaſſadors of God. Endeavour to eſtabliſh their dominion over the minds of men, by boaſting they can draw down celeſtial bleſſings, ibid. Numa Pompilius's correſpondence with the nymph Egeria, n. ibid. The eccleſiaſtic is diſtinguiſh'd by his eye, his voice, his gait, his geſture, &c. Every trade has its characteriſticks, n. 18. Braſilian prieſts vaſtly proud. The prieſthood hereditary in America, 18.

Soudras, the fourth caſte of the Brachmans, 314. Include the common people. Subdivided into a great number of others. Envy one another. One above the reſt. Their different employments; magiſtrates, ploughmen, maſons, painters, ſoldiers, ibid. Pallas's the moſt abject of all, 313. Perreas, the refuſe of the whole nation. Look'd upon as unclean. Forced to live ſeparate from the reſt. Their extreme poverty and deplorable condition. Are yet very proud. Siriperes abhor'd by the Perreas. Several ceremonies of the former. This precedency among the four caſtes grounded on a very whimſical reaſon, ibid. Particulars of it, 316.

Soul, human; origin of it, and ſtate after death, 354. Mankind created by Brahma, who gives being to nine men. The ſoul of man not ſuperiour to that of brutes, only that the former has more liberty to diſplay itſelf. This difference ariſes from the various conſtructions of the organs of men and beaſts: exemplified from childhood and old age, ibid. Singular opinions with regard to the origin of ſouls, 355. That the ſoul is immortal. Illuſtrated. Rewards and puniſhments after this life. The Druids, Germans, and Getes believed in tranſmigration. Reſtrictions which Porphyry made to this doctrine. To paſs into the body of a cow, the moſt honourable tranſmigration, except into that of man. An ox buried like a perſon of diſtinction. Some ſouls hover about in the air, and are miſerable. Souls puniſhed two ways. Some go into purgatory, others hurl'd into a deep well, where they continue for ever, in infinite pain, ibid. Deſcription of the torments, 356. Felicity promis'd the virtuous in the next life. Enjoyment of ſenſual pleaſures. Surgam, the ſeven inferior heavens. Few ſo virtuous as to be admitted to the enjoyment of the ſupreme felicity, ibid.

Soul, human, according to the Indians, 586. That man has a principle of life within him. Indians differ very much with regard to this principle. That man has a vegetative and intelligent ſoul. Particulars of each ſoul. That the ſoul of man is God himſelf: and even that of beaſts, &c. All ſouls created at the ſame inſtant. Two ſouls in man, ibid.

Submiſſion of the American women to their huſbands, 59. Always confin'd to their domeſtic concerns. Never give themſelves airs like the European women. That this is a great article of the marriage-ſtate, ibid.

Sweating of the Americans, 85. Thoſe of Miſſiſippi make a hot-bath, which is cover'd with the hides of wild bulls, and flint ſtones. They go into it naked, the juggler ſinging all the time, ibid. Account of their baths from La Hontan, n. ibid.

T.

TEMPLE of the ſun in Cuſco, 175. Deſcription of that wonderful edifice. The high altar. Walls cover'd with plates of gold. The ſun repreſented in gold with prodigious magnificence, ibid. The bodies of their monarchs embalmed in ſo ſurpriſing a manner, that they ſeem'd alive. Temple-gates cover'd over with gold plates. A plate of gold in the ſhape of a garland. A chapel for the habitation of the moon. The bodies of their deceaſed queens. Manſion of Venus. Thought to be the ſun's page. The Pleiades the moon's waiting maids. Apartment and gates cover'd with ſilver plates. Thunder and lightning conſider'd as the ſun's lacqueys. An apartment, the ceiling of gold. Some have attempted to draw a parallel between the Chriſtian religion and this ſtrange religion, 177. Apartment ſacred to the rainbow. Richly beautified. Superſtitious notion when the rainbow appear'd in the sky. Apartment of the high-prieſt. Its ornaments. The ſeveral gods of thoſe nations whom the Peruvians had conquer'd in this temple. Reflections on the conduct of the Incas's in this particular. The pompous temple at Titicaca. An Incas offering a golden veſſel to the ſun in it. Pachacamac one of the attributes of the ſun. The feſtival open'd with ſacrifices, ibid. Fire catch'd from the ſun with great ceremony, 178. Victims burnt with it. Fire got by rubbing two dry ſticks one againſt the other, when the ſun did not ſhine. Deeply afflicted when it did not break out, ibid.

Temple, principal one of the Eaſt-Indians, 265. Temple at Jeruſalem. Mecca. Pagod of Jaguarnat. Compar'd to ſeveral temples of antiquity in note [a]. Is vaſtly rich. Pilgrimages to it from the remoteſt parts of India. Very advantageous to the Bramins. Both Jews and Indians ſlaves to prejudice. Vide the note [b] for reflections on that ſubject. Both adhere zealouſly to antiquity. Vide the note [c] for objections againſt tradition, ibid. What is the whole knowledge of this people, 266. Vide the note [a], on the ignorance of multitudes of Chriſtians. The Indians make war by ſtarts, and are wholly guided by their prieſts. Sometimes fight with the utmoſt obſtinacy in defence of their religion. See the note [c]. Look on all other nations as profane. Vide the note [d]. The conqueſt of the Romans over the Jews, of great advantage to the latter. Vide the note [e], in which the Engliſh are applauded for their free-thinking. The Indians as much ſlaves as ever. Reflections on Alexander the Great's conqueſts in India, ibid. Both Jews and Indians have preſerv'd the ſimplicity which prevail'd in the infancy of the world, 267. See the note [a]. Why they adhere ſo ſtrongly to the counſels of the wiſe and learned. Are obedient to the precepts of religion. Learn only the uſeful ſciences. Why they ſhun all familiarity with foreigners. Are wholly employ'd in traffic, and therefore never projecting novelties, ibid.

Temples of the Mexicans, 135. Eight in the city of Mexico, vaſtly magnificent. Five hundred houſes might have ſtood in the court of Vitziliputzli's temple. Particular deſcription of this ſplendid edifice. The skulls of the unhappy men who had been ſacrificed, fix'd on poles near to it, ibid. Area ſo large, that 8 or 10,000 people uſed to dance therein, without crouding one another, on their ſolemn days, 136. Deſcription of a great ſtone edifice in the center of the area, or quadrangle. Pomp of it. Stone of a green colour, on which men were inhumanly ſacrificed. The idol Tlaloch. Two chapels immenſely rich. Temple of the god of the air. Deſcription of it. Temple of Teſcalipuca. Dark houſes to lodge a numberleſs multitude of idols, ſmear'd, or rather cruſted over with human blood, ibid.

Theft, hardly known among the Americans, 38. Owing to the little notion they have of ambition. The Lacedemonians approv'd of thieving. Allow'd by the Romans at certain ſeaſons, ibid. The Egyptians had a captain of thieves among them, 39. The Japoneſe won't ſuffer any kind of theft, ibid.

Time, according to the Indians, and the duration of ages, 389. Time divided into four ages. The three firſt were golden ages. Ram lives ſeventy thouſand years, without iſſue. The fourth, or preſent, an iron age. Reaſon why 'tis ſo. Different opinions of the Indians. Fourteen ages beſides. Prodigious duration of each, 389, & 390. The planets are gods, have wives, &c. 390.

Time, how meaſured by the inhabitants of Mogul, 264. Divide the natural day into eight parts. Meaſure time by a water clock. Different from our Clepſydra, or hour-glaſs. Deſcription of the latter, and that of the Moguls, which is always watch'd by a man. Some ſuppoſe the Teraphims were water clocks, ibid. Reaſons againſt it, 265.

Traffic of the Americans, 66. Don't employ money for that purpoſe. It conſiſts wholly in barter. This the cuſtom in the infant-ages, ibid.

Traffic of the Eaſt-Indians, 252. Are great traders. Great cheats. Very artful in their impoſitions. Are uſurers, ibid.

Tranſmigration of ſouls, 223. Indians believe in it. Hoſpitals for curing ſick beaſts. Certain Bramins who ſubſiſt only on herbs, milk, butter, &c. ibid. Conformity between them and the antient Egyptians, n. ibid. Banians adhere more ſtrictly to the doctrine of tranſmigration. Won't kill flies, ibid. Examples of their ridiculous charity to beaſts, n. ibid. Reflections on the diverſity of opinions, with regard to tranſmigration, ibid. Perhaps not eſtabliſh'd firſt among the Indians as an article of religion, 224. Whether the Indians receiv'd it from Pythagoras and his followers. The Chineſe had it 500 years before this philoſopher. Firſt ſtarted by Phoe, or Fo, a native of Ceylan. He ſets up for a prophet. Taught an interior and exterior doctrine. That the ſoul would be annihilated, &c. That he himſelf had experienced the truth of tranſmigration, ibid. Phoe's doctrine receiv'd in India, 225. Eaſily, and for what reaſons. Has given riſe to ſeveral ridiculous opinions. Phoe writ 40 volumes, ibid.

Travellers, charity of the Indians in providing drink for them, 225. People wait on the high roads to give paſſengers water, ibid. The Eaſterns in this caſe more charitable than the Europeans, 226. This the cuſtom in the infancy of the world. Abraham entertains three angels, ibid.

Travels, difficulty of writing them ſo as to pleaſe every body, 195.

Trinity, under the names of Bruma, Vixnu, and Rutrem, 368. Notion the Eaſt-Indian idolaters have of it. Paraxacti their mother. Bruma and Rutrem born with five heads. Power given to each. Heathens divided into ſix ſects on this head. That the eſſence of god is incomprehenſible. This notion ſullied with the moſt ridiculous fictions, ibid.

Tſchecteas, ſixth ſect among the Bramins, 317. Refuſe to follow the precepts of their law, and reject every thing that can't be demonſtrated by the teſtimony of the ſenſes, ibid.

V.

VEDAM, and the privileges it allows the Bramins, 318. 'Tis their book of the law. Writ in the Samſcortan tongue. Divided into four parts. Particulars of which each part treated. The fourth part loſt many years. Vedam of indiſputable authority. It allows the Bramins five privileges. The 1*ſt*, To celebrate the Jagam, i. e. a feaſt accompanied with a ſacrifice, ibid. This ſolemnity deſcrib'd, 319. Particulars concerning the Jagam. 2*dly*, To teach the Settrea's, &c. 3*dly*, To read the Vedam. 4*thly*, Liberty of teaching it to others. 5*th* Privilege, their being allow'd to beg. Charity of the Bramins, ibid.

Veinsjas, the third caſte of the Brachmans, 314. Live by traffic, and abſtain from things that have life. All the caſtes forbid to eat cows fleſh, ibid.

Virtues, vices, and civility of the Americans, 57. Have none of our politeneſs. Very little notion of ſubordination. Their only principles of decorum torum are, their obedience to their chiefs; reſpect to their parents and elders. The more independant people are, the leſs they are apt to give into politeneſs. Republicans not ſo polite as thoſe who inhabit monarchies. The Mexicans and Peruvians polite. Both gave their children good education. Men, without ſubordination, have no real regard for one another, ibid. Prov'd from commonwealths. The vaſt power and grandeur of the republic of Rome, n. ibid. Manner how the Savages of New-France and Florida receive their gueſts. The Savages have the ſame innate principles of vice and virtue as we, and have the utmoſt dread of reproach, and that infamy which reſults from the commiſſion of a baſe action. Their magnanimity very much ſullied by revenge. Exercis'd againſt men only. The principles of equity engraved in the hearts of all men. Americans obſerve an inviolable fidelity, and never over-reach one another, ibid. Nations apt to employ ſarcaſtical expreſſions one againſt the other, 59. The Savages abhor covetouſneſs. With what judgment they barter goods. Love to beſtow gifts, ibid.

Viſtncy, in the fourth and laſt age of the world, according to the Banians, 307. Viſtney, a famous and pious king. God takes him up to heaven. The preſent age the fourth, which will be longer than the reſt. The final judgment of this will be more dreadful than the reſt. By fire. The moon ſhall look red, the ſun ſhed his light like brimſtone, lightning ſhall flaſh. The ſky red as fire. The four elements at variance. Reaſons why the world ſhall be deſtroy'd by fire. The ſouls carried up to heaven, but the bodies will periſh, ibid.

Viſtnou, the ten corporeal ſhapes he aſſumed, 339. That of a fiſh, a tortoiſe, a hog; half man and half lion, &c. under the name of Dajerrata Rama. Reaſon of his aſſuming that ſhape. Two devils ſubdue the world, ibid. Tompacarna's wiſh, and a grant of ſleeping ſix months, 340. Two brothers build ſeven caſtles, viz. of gold, ſilver, copper, iron, &c. A man's three wives barren; the fire Homan lighted to cure it, and a man jumps out from it and preſents a remedy. Comical ſtory of Ramma and his wife Sita. The devil appears to her under the figure of a ſtag. Sita is run away with. Ramma goes in purſuit of her, and calls an ape to his aſſiſtance, and overthrows their enemies, ibid. The ape throws mountains into the ſea to make a bridge, 341. Sita, after many battles fought, is reſtor'd to her husband. The bridge broke, and a pagod built in its ſtead. The eighth appearance of Viſtnou, under the name of Kriſtna. The ninth, under the name of Boudiha: And the tenth, he aſſum'd the ſhape of a horſe, ibid.

Viſtnouva's, a ſect of the Bramins, 316. So call'd becauſe they acknowledge no other god but Viſtnou. Of two ſorts. 1ſt, Tadvadi-Viſtnouva's, ſignifying divine. Are diſtinguiſh'd by a white ſtreak over the forehead. That it defends from the devil, &c. 2dly, The Ramanouja's. Theſe draw with a kind of chalk over the forehead. Are a ſort of quietiſts. Theſe boaſt their being better men than the Tadvadi.

Vitzliputzli, the chief god of the Mexicans, 132, 133, &c.

Vixnu, his adventures, 370. Second ſon of Paraxacti. He married a wife, who is at the ſame time a cow, a horſe, &c. Nine metamorphoſes of Vixnu. 1ſt, Into a fiſh. 2d, A tortoiſe. A ſea of delicious butter. A golden mountain that ſupports the fourteen worlds. A prodigious adder brought over it, which is uſed as a rope. The giants pull the adder, and ſhake the world. Vixnu aſſumes the ſhape of a beautiful woman, to prevent the giants eating the delicious butter. They fall in love with her. Vixnu carries off the butter, and vaniſhes away with it. 3d, Vixnu changed into a hog. Rutrem lays a wager, that he could hide himſelf ſo, that his two brothers could not find his hands and feet. Bruma transforms himſelf into a ſwan, to look out his head, ibid. Deſpairs of ſucceſs, when he meets the thiſtle-flower, 371. Which ſalutes him, and ſhews him Rutrem's head. Bruma curſes the flower, and his brother. Vixnu transforms himſelf into a hog, throws up the earth with his ſnout, but does not find Rutrem's feet. 4th, Vixnu transforms himſelf into a half man, half lion. Occaſion of it. Iranien, a mighty giant. Rutrem grants him the privilege that no one ſhould kill him by night, or by day, in his houſe, or out of it. The giant deſpiſes Rutrem, &c. and bids his ſon do the ſame. The child diſobeys his father's commands, and prays to Vixnu. His tutor tells Iranien of it, who threatens to caſt his ſon to tygers, bears, &c. ibid. The child continues to pray to Vixnu, 372. His father being enraged, the god appears to him, under the ſhape of a half man, half lion, when he was ſtanding neither within nor without his houſe; tears him to pieces, and drinks every drop of his blood. 5th, Vixnu transform'd into a dwarf. Occaſion of it. A blood-thirſty giant governs the whole earth. Mankind pray to god to be deliver'd from him. Vixnu, in the ſhape of a dwarf, goes to him, and begs three foot of ground to build a houſe. The giant-king was going to grant it, when the morning-ſtar (his counſellor of ſtate) reſolves to hinder the grant paſſing; and ſlipping down the monarch's throat, the latter orders a ſtilletto to be put down it, which puts out one of the ſtar's eyes, whereby the promiſe he had made to Vixnu was ratified. The god ſwells to ſo prodigious a ſize, that the whole air and earth could ſcarce contain him, ibid. He ſets his foot on the giant's head, and kicks him down to hell, 373. Vixnu changed into a man call'd Ramene, or Ram, under his ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth incarnation. The 6th, occaſion'd by the pride and cruelty of the Rajahs, or petty kings. Vixnu fights againſt, and deſtroys them. Vixnu, a ſecond time Ram, to extirpate a thouſand arm'd giants; knocks him down with a plough-ſhare, and cuts off his thouſand arms. Raiſes a trophy with the giant's bones. Vixnu again made Ram. The occaſion. Three mighty giants carry off Sidi, Ram's wife. He ſearches for, but cannot find her, and therefore calls the apes to his aſſiſtance, ibid. They form an army, join Ram, and recover his wife, 374. He takes his wife again; is rallied for it by ſome laundreſſes, and thereupon abandons her again. Vixnu's 9th Incarnation, under a human ſhape call'd Chrixnen. Exodi, a woman, brings him forth; and her brother Campſen threatning to kill the babe, ſhe gives it her huſband, and bids him hide it in ſome deſart. Campſen ſets ſpies, but they are all eluded, and the child is given to, and educated by ſhepherds. Campſen goes to kill him, when he vaniſhes on a ſudden, and graſps only a little girl, ibid. Goes to kill her, and ſhe knocks him down backwards, 375. She vaniſhes. Searches for Chrixnen, but in vain. Campſen calls the devils to his aſſiſtance. Theſe ſubſtitute a witch in the place of Chrixnen's nurſe. The child ſucks all her blood out. Now grown older, he plays pranks among the ſhepherds. Steals butter from them; they tie him to a tree, and whip him. Being now a man, he raiſes an army, attacks and kills Campſen. Marries two wives, and takes 16,000 young ſhepherdeſſes for his concubines. Multiplies himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he enjoys them all at the ſame time. He ſtands by a pond, where ſeveral beautiful young women were waſhing themſelves, and runs away with their clothes, and climbs up a tree, ibid. They cover themſelves with leaves, 376. And entreat him to return their clothes. The leaves drop off, and he views them naked, ibid. Vixnu to be again metamorphoſed, ibid.

Unctions of the Eaſt-Indians, 261. Oil highly valued antiently for its many uſes, ibid. A ſovereign remedy againſt head-achs, 262. Indians uſe oil of cocoa. The antients uſed oil to heal wounds, make the nerves ſupple. Uſed alſo by the Indians. Oils firſt employ'd that were not ſcented. Bathyllus repreſented in Anacreon. Virgil's deſcription of Turnus. The primitive Chriſtians alſo rubb'd themſelves with oil. Odoriferous oils, ibid. Reflections on the fondneſs our ladies have for perfumes, 263. Jews preſented eſſences in viſits. The antients ſmear'd birds with oil. Anacreon on this head, ibid.

Vows of the Americans, 97. In a dearth, a portion of the firſt beaſt they ſhall kill promis'd to the great ſpirit. The protection of their Manitou implor'd, by preſenting a lighted pipe to him thrice, &c. ibid.

Vyſhnev, in the ſecond age of the world, 288. Is created, and adores his maker. Has the charge of preſerving all creatures, ibid. God gives all things into his power for that purpoſe, 289. Vyſhnev provides every thing neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence, ibid.

W.

WALLS, none among the Americans, 38. Each Savage marks out the limits of his land with a kind of net-work. The breaking thro' it a very criminal action, ibid.

War, ceremonies thereof, among the Braſilians, 167. Are repreſented revengeful, ibid. All who take priſoners, obliged to fatten them, 168. Theſe captives have women given 'em to divert themſelves with. Americans inclin'd to a brutal intrepidity. The captive carry'd up and down in triumph, and expoſed to the inſults of the populace. Stones given him, which he throws at thoſe round him. His brains daſh'd out with a club. They eat his body, ibid.

War, ceremonies thereof, among the Savages of Darien, 158. A ſolemn ſmoaking-feaſt. Women march to the war as well as men. Burn their priſoners of war, ibid. How dreſs'd when they come into the aſſemblies, 159. Wear necklaces weighing 25 or 30 pounds. They dance in their formalities. A boy ſmoaks in the faces of all the counſellors. Never allow any quarter to their enemies. Savages of New-Granada, &c. caſtrate all their young captives. Wear the teeth of their enemies, ibid.

War, how made by the Eaſt-Indians, &c. 258. Their armies a crowd of rabble. Every horſeman has always two or three ſervants, and as many women. In an army of 100,000 perſons, ſcarce 10,000 fighting men. The Fakirs ſwarm among them, ibid. Their manner of begging, 259. Moors and Indians fight without order. Always drink opium before they engage, to make themſelves intrepid. Ridiculous manner in which their cavalry fight; compared to children's playing at priſon-baſe. Way of fighting, as practiſed by the Jews. Had a ſmall number of cavalry. The Jews uſed to ride on aſſes. Vide the note [d]. Very much eſteem'd by them, 260. Indians employ elephants in battle. Some account of thoſe beaſts. In what manner the Romans engag'd 'em. Stratagem of queen Semiramis, who had a great number of wooden elephants carved in her wars in India. The elephants in king Porus's army oppoſe the forces of Alexander the Great, ibid. Courage of that on which king Porus rode, ibid.

War, ceremonies thereof among the Floridians, 119. Americans in general revengeful. Extraordinary method by which the Floridians excite one another to vengeance. A man, on theſe occaſions, is wounded with darts. The wounded perſon carried by the women, who are in tears, to a hut. His wound is heal'd. They ſing and dance. The prieſt and idol always conſulted before they go to war. The ſun invoked, ibid. Water thrown up into the air, &c. Speech to the warriors on this occaſion. The prieſts conſulted on expeditions. The pretended magician lays himſelf upon a ſhield; draws a circle of unintelligible figures. The prieſt in violent agitations. The god ſuppos'd to leave him. Goes and acquaints the king with the reſult of the ſpiritual conference. They ſcalp their enemies. Their arms and legs hung on poles, where the prieſt pronounces curſes againſt the enemy. Widows, who addreſs the king about their husbands who died in battle. Hermaphrodites ſaid to carry the baggage in war, ibid.

Warlike ceremonies of the Canadans, Miſſiſippians, &c. Calumet of peace, and that of war, diſtinguiſh'd by their feathers. The leaving of the Calumet ſacred, ibid. A peace concluded by ſmoaking out of the Calumets, 92. Different things denoted by the various plumage. The Calumet-dance a prelude to all great exerciſes, ibid. War declared, by ſending back a priſoner with an ax, 93. Proclamation of war opens with a banquet, ibid. The war-feaſt given by the general. Deſcription of it, n. ibid. The general fixes the day of ſetting out, and the general rendezvous. Women order'd to proſtitute themſelves to their warriors, to engage theſe to exert themſelves for their country. Savages, at what age they go into the field. Are two or three months in making their military preparations. Ceremonies obſerv'd by the general on this occaſion; faſts once every two days; hangs great kettles on the poles of his hut, &c. Begins the march, and ſings the Death-ſong, which conſiſts of furious expreſſions. His face is ſmutted with black, in order that their enemies may not ſee him grow pale. A ſolemn feſtival, on which the great ſpirit is invok'd, the day after they ſet out to war. An altar raiſed; their gods, 94. Made of bears skins, ſet on them. They bend the knee to 'em. The jugglers held their phyſical bags in their hands, pretending they mark'd out all who were to die in the field. The maſter of the ceremonies gives his bleſſing to the people, who fall proſtrate before him. Dreadful howling of dogs, who are to be ſacrificed on this occaſion. The jugglers call ſeveral from their trances, who pretended to counterfeit the dead, when they all dance higgledy-piggledy. Trances ſucceeded by miracles. Some ſwallow ſticks a foot and a half long. They all withdraw to their huts. Warriors carry their wives and concubines into the field. They attack generally in ambuſcades. Take off the ſcalps from the dead. The mournful ſhout. Think the burial of the dead one of the duties of humanity, ibid. Verſes from Horace, as imitated by Prior, on this occaſion, ibid. Divide the captives among their families, who ſing all the while their fate is pronouncing, 95. Homage paid to the chief leaders, at their return from an expedition. Several arrows preſented them. The commander keeps a kind of open table while the war laſts, ibid.

Wars of the Americans, 60. They never break out from a principle of avarice or ambition, but a kind of punctilio. Their warlike diſpoſition very antient among them. The ſource of the perpetual wars, which are carried on among the Americans, accounted for. Their quarrels ariſe from emulation. The Greeks were always arm'd, in their entertainments, their recreations, and ſolemn feſtivals. The great neceſſity of forming the mind by education, exemplified by a fine paſſage from Monſ. De Crouſaz's treatiſe on education, n. ibid. The Spaniards fond of wearing their ſwords by their ſides, 61. The Americans wars founded on repriſals. Their old men are the orators, and rouze them to war; as alſo among the Greeks. Braſilians make long ſpeeches in the field of battle. A whimſical way of trying the fate of war among ſome nations of New-France. How ſeveral Savage nations denounce war. The Calumet, and a warlike-dance on theſe occaſions. The battle begins by ſhouts. The Braſilians play on a kind of flute, made of the leg-bones of their priſoners. Are never allow'd to take quarter, and obliged to die with their weapons in their hands. Their courage not a tranſient fury. Fight to the laſt. The Greeks leſt their enemies a prey to beaſts; the Americans do the very reverſe. The Savages of North America kill all ſuch as are able to make reſiſtance; thoſe of the South ſave them, in order to fatten and eat them, ibid. Mexicans, Peruvians, and Floridians ſacrifice their enemies to their gods, 62. Reflections on this religious havock mention'd in ſcripture. The Braſilians make him chief, or leader, who has kill'd the moſt enemies. That this dignity is hereditary, when the ſon of a chief is brave. This maxim of the Savages, on what probably grounded. A very good one in ſtates which are founded wholly on wars. Dangerous in thoſe of Europe, becauſe of the refin'd policy practiſed in them. In the firſt ages of the world, the dignity of the king and the general were united in one perſon. The antient Britons choſe commanders to lead them into the field. As alſo the antient Germans; but the people inſpected all his actions with a watchful eye. Arms of the Americans, bows, arrows, and clubs. Theſe are of great antiquity. They go naked into the field, and have a large ſhield which covers the body, ibid. They carry the hair of their enemies into the field by way of ſtandard, 63. Carry curtezans along with 'em. The Greeks did the ſame. Their ambuſcades and skirmiſhes, like thoſe of the Tartars. The battle being ended, they cut off the heads of their ſlain. They drink the blood of their enemies. Their enemies ſcalps preſerved as ſo many trophies. The antients cut off the heads of theirs, and carried them in triumph. The Boiens uſed to clear their enemies ſkulls, take their brains out, adorn 'em with gold and ſilver, and make drinking bowls of 'em, ibid.

Wars of the Caribees, 126. No ſtated time for holding theſe aſſemblies. Some old woman draws up the whole plan of the war. Stirs them up to revenge. Throws ſome of the broil'd limbs of their enemies among them. Fight in ambuſcade. Cover themſelves all over with boughs and leaves. Stand thus behind a tree, and attack their enemies. Their arrows always poiſon'd. Particular deſcription of them. So made that the poiſon'd part falls in the body, ibid.

Wine, averſion the Indians have to it, 249. Difficult to account for it. Some notions ſtarted on that head. Perhaps the virtue of ſome antient Brachmans might occaſion it, ibid. Reaſons why the antient Brachmans forbid the uſe of wine, n. ibid. The Jews and Nazarenes abſtain'd from wine, ibid. The Mahometans don't ſcruple to eat grapes, 250. The European vines planted in India thrive well. The Bramins drink a great quantity of melted butter. Said to fuddle them. In the infancy of the Roman republic, the Roman women prohibited to drink wine. Egnatius Meceninus puts his wife to death upon that account. This ſeverity owing to the jealouſy of husbands. Ovid knew that wine inſpires luſt. The Egyptian prieſts abſtain'd a long time from wine. That people imagin'd it was hated by the gods, ibid. The Indians antiently great drinkers, proved from Athenæus, n. ibid. A drinking-match eſtabliſh'd by Alexander the Great, after the death of the celebrated Calanus, 251. Concubines who fill'd out wine to the Indian king, and when he was drunk, carried him to bed. Scarce poſſible to reconcile two paſſages in Quintus Curtius, with one in Athenæus, relating to the drinking of the Indians. Reflections on Alexander's making ſo many men drunk, to celebrate the obſequies of Calanus. When the change of the Indians from drunkenneſs to ſobriety might have happen'd. Muſt have been cauſed by ſome famous legiſlator, ibid. Skyras, a Perſian wine, famous over all India, 252.

Wiſtnou, Wichnu, or Wiſtnu, 414. Son to Quivelinga. How imag'd. Groteſque particulars concerning him, ibid. & 415. His ten incarnations, or metamorphoſes, 415, to 422. Explications of them, according to Father Kircher, from 422. to 424. Wiſtnou worſhipp'd under the name of Jagarnat, 424, & 425.

Wives of Viſtnou and Eſtara, 338. The beautiful Latſami produced from the foam of the ſea. Ridiculous particulars of Parvati. She jumps into the fire. Virreſadra, kick'd the ſun, and broke all his teeth; and drubb'd the moon ſo heartily, that he made her face all over ſpots. Datja reſtor'd to life, and a goat's head fix'd on his body, ibid. Parvati becomes half man, and half woman, 339. Viſtnou and Eſtara can get children by the bare act of the will. Eſtara repreſented under a very ſcandalous ſhape. The origin of it, was from his being catch'd in a particular attitude with Parvati, ibid.

Women in India, burnt or buried with their huſbands; the complete account of that barbarous ceremony, 334, 335. Infamy which attends thoſe women who refuſe to comply on theſe occaſions, and the artful inſinuations uſed to excite them to obey, 335.

Works, good works, and religious auſterities of the Bramins, 356. The doctrine of merits, rewards and puniſhments, not diſtributed in this life, from the variety of man's births, ibid. Certain exerciſes convey a remiſſion of ſins, 357. Auſterities. Account of a Bramin, who ſtood in a very uneaſy poſture. Sets his head where his heels ſhould be; repeats ſeveral prayers, raiſes a kind of gibbet, makes a fire, and ſwings himſelf over it for half an hour. This his daily exerciſe. His motives for doing this. A ſecond Bramin, wore an iron collar, weighing 24 pounds. Two others draw heavy chains. A fifth chains himſelf to a tree for life. A ſixth walks in ſhoes ſtuck full of nails on the inſide, ibid.

World, notion the Indians have of it, and the time 'tis to endure, 386. Fourteen worlds. Hell the loweſt of all, ibid. The world of ſerpents, 387. Seas of boil'd ſugar, palm wine, &c. The three hundred and thirty thouſand millions of giants always at war with one another. The world of nations. World of penitents. World of milk. Ceremonies perform'd by the Bramins, by which they immediately become the ſubſtance of god. Are worſhipp'd by the women. Theſe Bramins are abominable wretches. The fourteen worlds ſupported by a high mountain of gold, ibid. Earthquakes cauſed by an adder, which is under the world, moving itſelf, 388. The adder cauſes eclipſes. Aſtronomy of the Eaſt-Indians, ibid.

Writing, manner thereof in India, 255. Write upon the leaf of a tree with a bodkin. Leaves, how prepared; made like a fan. Taken notice of by the antients. So thin, that the ſmalleſt puff of wind tears them to pieces. Writing at firſt, employ'd only in great incidents. Stones firſt uſed for tranſmitting events to future ages. Enoch engrav'd the ſtory of the creation. Joſhua wrote all Deuteronomy round a ſtone altar, ibid. All Homer's Iliad wrote on a ſerpent's skin, 256. Abbreviations uſed antiently. Men afterwards wrote on metal. Tables of wood uſed alſo; particularly of the cedar-tree. The Arabians wrote with the ſhoulder-bones of ſheep and camels. Pocock quoted on this occaſion. Papyrus, a kind of ruſh ruſh invented by the Egyptians. Parchment afterwards found out. Difficult to know who firſt invented letters, ibid. Generally ſaid to be the Phenicians, 257. Verſes from Lucan's Pharſalia, n. ibid. Reflections on the hieroglyphicks of the antients. Compoſed of the figures of plants and animals. Vide alſo the notes [b], [c], [d]. The Greeks pretend to have firſt invented writing. Reflections on this head, ibid. Paper, ſo call'd from Papyrus. Not known when, or who invented it. Melchior Inchoffer, a German jeſuit, and Father Mabillon's opinion on this head, ibid.

Wyſe, the fourth ſon of Pouraus, 284. Of an inventive brain. Was the original of handicrafts. Travels towards the South. Meets with ſeven ſeas, and builds a ſhip. Builds a houſe in a delightful ſite. The houſe deſcrib'd, ibid. Jejunagundah, a woman, comes to his ſolitude, 285. Admires the houſe. Wyſe ſees, and goes up to her. Deſcription of her perſon, and the fragrant odours which diffuſed themſelves from it. She ſpeaks to him. He compliments her highly. She refuſes his offers of ſervice. Flies from him with coy diſtaſte, which afflicts him grievouſly. goes in ſearch of, and meets with her in a valley gathering flowers. He again addreſſes her, with ſoothing words. She deſires him to leave her, ibid. They part, 286. He bemoans his fate in ſolitude. Invokes the trees. A voice iſſues thro' the leaves, and asks him what he wants. He deſires to enjoy the woman; which is granted. Their poſterity people the South, ibid.

Wyſes, the fourth caſte in India, 304. Are handicrafts, ibid. Their name implies ſervile, 305. Now commonly call'd Gentiles. Theſe of two ſorts, pure and impure. The purer have 56 caſtes.

YEAR of ſeveral Americans, 98. Among the Hurons, Canadans, &c. compoſed of twelve ſynodical months. Moon of March call'd the worm-moon. Of April, the moon of plants; of May, moon of ſwallows, &c. Loſt moon, as the Savages term it, what. Month of illumination, &c. Dead moon, ſo call'd when that planet is hid from the ſight, ibid. Naked days, 99. Artificial day and night, how computed, ibid.

Year and records of the Virginians, 115. Compute their year by winters. Divide them into five ſeaſons. The firſt, when the trees ſhoot forth, &c. Count their months by lunations. Moon of the ſtags, of corn, &c. Tranſmit incidents to poſterity by certain ſtrings, ibid.
